

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

600021590N

249.3.64.

SOME ACCOUNT OF MYSELF.

SOME ACCOUNT OF MYSELF.

BY CHARLES EARL OF ERPINGHAM,
&c. &c. &c.

IN Four Volumes.

"It is my intention to represent Characters such as they are in life; but Heaven forbid that I should pourtray any person in particular."—
LE SAGE.

VOL. I.

LONDON:

PRINTED FOR W. SIMPKIN & R. MARSHALL,
Stationers' Court, Ludgate Street.

1817.

Plummer and Brewis, Printers, Love Lane, Eastcheap.

CONTENTS.

VOLUME I.

CHAP.	PAGE:
I. My Motives for Writing.....	1
II..... Birth, Parentage and Education....	16
III. .. Friendship	30
IV. .. Confidence	46
V. Physiognomy.....	71
VI.... Determination	89
VII... Taste	107
VIII... Honour	129
IX..... Reflection	143
X. The Rent Day	157

CHAP.	PAGE.
XI.....The Spunging House.....	176
XII. ..Seriousness	198
XIII. ..Condolence.....	217
XIV. ..Destiny	233
XV. ..L'entre Sol.	247

VOLUME II.

I.Dinner	1
II.Whist	17
III.....Chit Chat	30
IV.....Breakfast	48
V.Honi soit qui mal y pense-	62
VI.Separation	74
VII. ..Declaration	88
VIII. ..Distraction	105
IX.Satisfaction	118
X.Consequences	134
XI.Integrity.....	147
XII. ..Improvement	162
XIII. ..Connisseurship	181
XIV. ..Precedence	200

CONTENTS.

iii

CHAP.	PAGE.
XV.....Cordiality	218
XVI. ..Conjugality.....	237

VOLUME III.

I.....Literature	1
II.An old Acquaintance	13
III.Crim. Con.	27
IV.Promises	44
V.A Road to Preferment	59
VI.Presumptive Evidence	81
VII.....Positive Proof.....	98
VIII. ..Explanation	112
IX.A Winter's Tale.....	127
X.....A Man of Business	142
XI.A Family Party.....	157
XII.A Debut	173
XIII. ..Proposals	194
XIV. ..Negociations	208
XV.A Son-in-law	224
XVI.Retrenchment	240

2 MY MOTIVES FOR WRITING.

tion is become almost useless. Few are willing to acknowledge their inferiority even to themselves; — improvement of the good qualities of the head and heart can, therefore, only be effected by the force of example; and as an individual is seldom fortunate enough to witness any great portion of the realities, he must be contented with the resemblances, as they are occasionally pourtrayed to the life, in the works of those who have endeavoured to analyze the thoughts and actions of themselves, or of other people.

“Histories,” says some writer or other, for I shall not trouble myself with the names of authors, or with the dates of events, — “histories are romances which we do believe, and romances are histories which we do not believe.” It is, therefore, no very extraordinary stretch of the imagination to apply them equally to the purposes of example. Men in all ages have been men, and whether they have lived in the reign of the Conqueror, or in that of George the Third, the same passions have pervaded the human race; the same good and evil have been observable.—The Clodius of Rome exists in ———, and the Messalina in ———.

I have just mentioned that I shall not trouble myself with dates or names; they are in reality of little importance: the want of date, although it may impeach the veracity of an occurrence in the confined view of a technical genealogist, does not destroy it with those who seek for information in the book of nature. Nor does the withholding a name prove an intention on the part of a writer to convert to his own use the property of another. In the following pages, where my memory, on which alone I depend, enables me to illustrate my thoughts, by passages from other writers, I shall not scruple to avail myself of such assistance; but at the same time, I shall, as far as lies in my power, tell the reader whenever I resort to the use of it. But it will unavoidably happen at times, that ideas which I may imagine to be my own, may have emanated from other brains ; in that case I have only to observe with Bayes in the Rehearsal that “Shakespeare and myself have hit upon the same thought.”

4. MY MOTIVES FOR WRITING.

It was complained of the author I have last mentioned, that his kings were not sufficiently royal, nor his Romans sufficiently Roman. One of his commentators, and perhaps the best, (but, I make no claim to critical sagacity,) observes in his defence, that he neither thought of Romans nor kings, but only of men—“He added drunkenness to the vices of the Danish Usurper, in order to make him appear more odious, and wanting a buffoon, he went to the senate house, for that which the senate would certainly have afforded him.”—In the course of the following pages, the reader will perhaps meet with personages whose actions as little accord with their situation in life, as drunkenness with royalty, or buffoonery with senatorial dignity. He may be introduced to a peer of the fancy, or perchance to a political drover, and find "some made critics nature meant but fools." They are still men, and it is with mankind, (womankind in all cases understood), that my life has been passed—a burden to myself,—to none a blessing, and to many a curse.

In presenting to the world the memoirs of a man distinguished by no brilliant actions, nor remarkable for any acquirements that can separate him from the herd of bipeds, who fill up the blanks of society, and who occupy the intermediate space between the positive and the negative; it is necessary, in order to excite even a moderate degree of interest, that this deficiency in striking events should have a

6 MY MOTIVES FOR WRITING.

counterpoise of some description or other. This, in the opinion of those who are satisfied with taking the world as they find it, may in some measure be supplied from the occurrences which I have to relate of myself and of others, with whom chance or destiny, which ever the reader pleases, has connected me. These occurrences have happened within the sphere of those forming, in my apprehension, the great bulk of society; namely, the gay and thoughtless in youth, the pedantic and empty in maturity, and the peevish and fretful in the decline of life. I have long passed my grand climacteric;—in the course of nature my days must soon close;—reading fatigues me;—friends I have none;—I have unwillingly, and without an intention to do wrong, been the cause of misery to many;—the bitterness of my reflections are not alleviated by the recollection of a single good action;—I have deserted the world, and am deservedly deserted by it ;—time hangs heavy upon my hands ;—the demon of listlessness is hovering round my easy chair, if easy it can be called, when its occupier is at variance with himself, and with every body about him. To employ my vacant hours and to relieve myself from the dull monotony of watching the clock, or the weather, I have resorted to the pen, certain of present amusement, but doubtful whether that instability which has accompanied me through life, will permit me to persevere in an occupation to which I have been wholly unaccustomed, until I have completed my task of laying before the rising generation such an account of my feelings and conduct, as may prove a beacon to headstrong youth, and to obstinate age.

In the eyes of the law, I have been guilty of no infringement upon the criminal code. In the eyes of humanity

8 MY MOTIVES FOR WRITING.

my sins are manifold, and against conscience my transgressions are innumerable. As far as I am enabled, the picture I shall draw of what I am, and what I have been, shall be a correct likeness; but it is possible that I may deceive myself, and that my pen may, unknown to me, gloss over follies which I am now above concealing. My object is to delineate the character and actions of a man, whose heart and person nature had cast in her kindest mould, but whose happiness, comforts and prospects have been invariably blasted, by a rash dependence upon first impressions, and who imbibed in early life an intolerable pride, which prevented him from seeking or giving explanations, even on the most tender points. Who, profusely gifted by fortune, passed through the vale of life without one cheering ray of friendship. Who might have ranked among the happiest of the happy, but whose follies and early prejudices have classed him among those to whom existence is intolerable.

MY MOTIVES FOR WRITING. 9

A considerable time elapsed between my determination to write, and the commencement of my work, before I could make up my mind as to the best method of compiling my memoirs. Every species of writing appeared to me to possess its peculiar advantages. The epistolary above every other kind seemed calculated to enable the reader to enter, as it were, into the very soul of the writer; but I had no friend to whom I could address myself, even in imagination, and I felt aware of the necessity of supposing that the party to whom the letters are ostensibly addressed should actually feel an interest in what concerns the writer. Besides it had often struck me that the long winded letters which we are to believe have passed between the characters in our best epistolary novels, give to the personages an air of trifling. Minutiæ may interest in conversation, and even in narrative writing; but it is ridiculous to suppose that sensible beings would permit the most trivial incidents to occupy the mind, first in the action, and then in the relation to the Fides Achates. There is also, another defect: the interest excited by the combination is often weakened, if not destroyed by the separate relation which the parties have to make of their respective shares in the transactions.

10 MY MOTIVES FOR WRITING.

The advantages of the narrative style in describing passing events are undoubted. The writer, who adopts the use of the third person, assumes the privilege of ubiquity. He can speak for every person, and can account for every action; but it is next to impossible to separate the author from the speaker; the same impressions, and the same turn of thought, will pervade the mind of both. Hence the histo rian and the writer of another's life, identify themselves and their opinions with their subjects. The puritanical memorialists of Cromwell have handed down to posterity an account of his "seeking the Lord," at the same moment that his intimate companions well knew, that he was only seeking the corkscrew.

Much awkwardness attends biography where an uninterested person stands forth as the writer, particularly if the subject of his work be not contemporaneous with himself. If he indulge in a comprehensive view, he must neglect the fore ground to give effect to the distant landscape. He is apt to consider himself as called upon, in some measure, to lay open the secret springs of his hero's actions, and to unveil the inmost recesses of the heart. This, even with an intimate acquaintance with the person, can rarely be accomplished: dependence on the writer, then, must necessarily be reduced to the dry detail of facts, and the most ingenious surmises must be levelled to the order of distant probabilities. To account for his motives, the hero is often endowed with virtues he never contemplated, and vices he never possessed. The effects of accident are frequently attributed to abstruse design, and the result of elaborate intention degraded to an union with chance.

12 MY MOTIVES FOR WRITING.

Here the recorder of his own thoughts and actions, has the manifest advantage of drawing his knowledge from the fountain head. He may, it is true, deceive himself in small particulars, such as mistaking profusion for generosity, pride for conscious dignity, and avarice for œconomy. He may fancy that he is charitable when he is only ostentatious, and that he is following the dictates of sense when he is driven by the impulse of folly. But these are blemishes of the slightest order; he can never disguise from himself the consciousness of a good or of a bad action; nor can he conceal from his own mind the purity or the impurity of the feelings by which he was actuated. He may, perhaps, at times succeed in lulling his conscience, but the secret monitor will not be long silenced. It is impossible to prevent his becoming an egotist, for it is his business to be one. He has to deliver a plain unvarnished tale of the scenes and occurrences in which he has been engaged, and of the persons with whom he has been connected. In his delineations of mankind, he may, perhaps, occasionally stumble upon "humours," which are neither more nor less, than the same passions under different disguises. The Bobadil of the present day does not pride himself on exposing a remnant of tobacco, and declaring it to be all that remains of a "pound, since yesterday was a week, as I am a gentleman and a soldier;" but he may be daily seen stalking the streets, with whiskers equally tremendous, and looks equally terrific; and if a cane were laid across his shoulders he would be equally "planet struck." At all events the self biographer cannot well avoid explaining the reasons for his conduct as he proceeds: thus answering the noblest aim of biography, the furnishing an insight into the human heart.

14 MY MOTIVES FOR WRITING.

I have seriously reflected whether I possessed sufficient command over myself, to search into the inmost recesses of my own breast; whether I could bear the recalling of painful recollections without dismay, and chearful ones without regret; and whether my mind could endure the recital, with my own hand, of follies which distress me, and vices which appal me. But my breast is steeled; and my frame has long ceased to vibrate either with lively pleasure, or with acute pain. Launched into the world with every prospect of comfort and happiness, and with the means of procuring every indulgence which fancy or caprice could desire, the past has been miserable, the present is intolerable, and the future on this side the grave, is hopeless.

Previous, however, to commencing the "account of myself," I shall look back at what I have already written, and pause for a few moments to recollect myself.

CHAP. II.BIRTH, PARENTAGE AND EDUCATION.

AS few, if any, are allowed the privilege of choosing their own parents, I was obliged to take up with my lot as I found it. My father had derived a very considerable property from his ancestors, with the name of Charles Somers Monkton, and the titles of Earl of Erpingham, Viscount Winterbourne, and Baron Cressy of Wickworth. My mother was the only daughter and heiress of Eldridge Bingwood, Esq. of Bingwood Abbey, in the County of Derby; she was also the divorced wife of the fourth Duke of Thetford. It is foreign to my purpose to speak of things which do not relate personally to myself; I shall therefore only remark that my father, who was a man of honour and gallantry, notwithstanding he had debauched the wife of his friend; paid the Duke the sum of fifteen thousand pounds, which a jury considered to be an adequate compensation for the alleged breach upon his Grace's peace of mind. My father, who was fortunately a bachelor, made the Duchess every reparation, and healed the wounds which he had been the means of inflicting on her reputation, as far as lay in his power.

My mother, as I have been led to believe, was of that silent and reserved disposition, which people in general convey to the comprehension of others under the appellation of sullenness. Those who had been acquainted with her in her early years, and before her union with his Grace, have often assured me that she was then the very reverse of what I have now stated.

Her marriage with the Duke was entirely against her consent, and perhaps occasioned that change in her temperament. Her affections had been previously engaged, and she was led to the altar, an unwilling sacrifice at the shrine of grandeur. Indeed, from the little I have heard or seen of his Grace, it was, in my opinion, utterly impossible, that a sensible woman which my mother certainly was, should have felt towards him either esteem or regard. My father, gay and insinuating, appeared to her, I suppose, a pleasanter companion than a brutish tyrannical husband. Neglect on the part of the Duke, and opportunity on the part of my father, led to a result which frequently occurs in high life, to the no small gratification of the gentlemen of the long robe.

In my father's case, matters, were more favourable than generally happens, for a large fortune was settled on my mother for her sole use. Honour and the dread that the finger of scorn should be held up against him, reluctantly compelled the Duke to part from his wife. My father took her and the money together and, adding, according to her father's will, her maiden name to his title, adopted the signature of Bingwood Erpingham.

To make some amends for my mother's taciturnity and sullenness, my father was one of the most passionate men in existence; but his passion was most commonly of a transient nature, and vented itself in clamorous verbiage. He was hasty and thoughtless in committing an injury, and generally uneasy until he had afforded redress. He was, however, quick in resentment, and unforgiving when thoroughly offended. The bad points in his character were partially counterbalanced by some excellent qualities; his temper was naturally open and generous, and with a companion who would have considered it a duty to study his disposition and to humour his failings, he might have made an exemplary husband, and might probably have been an ornament to society. Of his talents, I can say but little, but I am inclined to think that, if any thing, they were rather on the uppermost side of mediocrity.

But whether it was the losing herself in her own estimation, or whether the uncomfortable life she led with the Duke, had rendered her silent disposition habitual to her, I cannot pretend to decide; at all events, I believe, it would have been difficult to have found a couple in the world more completely burdensome to each other. Their tempers were thoroughly discordant; in their pursuits they had no inclination in common between them; and I imagine that the only interchange of speech consisted in mutual reproaches. My mother, with good reason, chose to live in retirement. My father, although his thoughts were directed to the gay world, voluntarily acquiesced in order to preserve appearances. Things continued some years in this state, when the same hour which brought me into the world, took my mother out of it.

For this information respecting my family, I am indebted to the Reverend Edward Perceval, who was my mother's resident chaplain at the time of her marriage with my father, and who was subsequently appointed my tutor. The truth of it I cannot in the least doubt; for I unfortunately inherited with the Bingwood estates the reserved disposition of my mother, and with the title and estates of Erpingham, the hasty temperament of my father. It was the union of these two opposite qualities which I imagine produced a third,—an invincible objection to acknowledge myself in error, joined with a fixed determination, as I have before observed, of avoiding explanation whenever I had taken offence.

With a mind thus constituted, and with an education conducted upon the principle of unlimited indulgence, it could not be a matter of wonder that I should pass through life without deriving any rational enjoyment from the profuse gifts of fortune ; and that after running a career of folly and dissipation, I should be left, towards the close of life, a plague to myself and to every one about me.

The ample fortune of my maternal grandfather, which had been laboriously accumulated in trade, devolved immediately upon myself, but with a strict entail upon the male line to the total exclusion of the female branches. The reasons for this, as my grandfather had left an only daughter, I could never exactly comprehend. Probably, like many other fathers, similarly circumstanced, he had found no small difficulty in the disposal of an heiress to his satisfaction. In the event of my decease without a son, the property was consigned to some distant relations, who, either out of affection for me or my fortune, were constantly making the most tender enquiries into the state of my health. I remember, in my childhood, when they have called to visit me, overhearing their calculations upon the probabilities of the hooping-cough, the measles, the small-pox, as well as other little incidental mishaps, removing the fatal obstacle which stood between them and their hopes. A putrid fever once diffused a universal joy amongst them: "the poor child was at his last gasp, he should not be tortured with swallowing trash that could be of no service to him." They were, perhaps, my best friends after all, for I recovered; which might not have been the case if I had been left to the persecution of the medical attendants. Like a cat, I might probably have been gifted with nine lives. Certain it is, however, that in defiance of all prognostics, my health and strength increased with my years, and upon my discovering no inclination for fox-hunting, and seeming to be somewhat careful of my neck, my kind hearted friends considered me as an incorrigible blockhead, who had not spirit enough to run into danger.

My father looked upon me not only as provided for, but as one who had robbed him of no small portion of his income, for my mother had permitted him to consider her fortune as his own. But at her death, the trustees appointed under the will of my grandfather, took the management of the estates into their own hands. My father generously threw me into the bargain, for as there was now nothing to prevent his returning to his former pursuits, he absolved himself from all further trouble as far as I was concerned. He took his leave of me and rushed into the pleasures of the metropolis, where dissipation became the order of the day.

My education was entirely committed to the superintendence of my tutor Mr. Perceval, who, in addition to his office of "bear leader," was raised to the rank of deputy guardian. He had early disgusted me, and could never afterwards regain my confidence; but as he obsequiously acted in any way I directed, anticipated my wishes as far as lay in his power, and left me to pursue my own inclination in every respect, I did not murmur at his attendance upon me, although he never experienced any other treatment besides cold neglect. With no one to respect, and no one to feel an interest in pleasing, it is not surprising that I did not make any extraordinary progress in my studies: in fact, study only took its turn when my mind was weary of every thing else. If I thought at all it was to look forward to the full enjoyment of my fortune ; nothing but the complete possession could satisfy me ; and as I had been placed out of the reach of temptation, my present wants were few in number and small in amount.

My mother, for reasons best known to herself, and contrary to the wishes of my father, had thought proper to fix her residence at Bingwood in preference to Erpingham. As I chanced to be born there, there I was suffered to remain ; and although the heir to such immense wealth, previous to my sixteenth year, I had scarcely wandered from my own domain. With the neighbouring families my mother had refused to hold the slightest intercourse ; her son therefore was suffered to remain unknown and unknown. By my father, except by the half yearly letters of Perceval, I was entirely forgotten, until his necessities reminded him that I was still in existence. About the time that I had attained my sixteenth year, my father, for the first time expressed a wish to see me, not from any motive of affection, but from necessity. His extravagant expenditure had so embarrassed his circumstances, as to make him desirous to ascertain the probability of his obtaining my assistance in releasing him from his difficulties, on my completing my twenty-first year, by docking the entail of part of the family estates.

My father then visited Bingwood Abbey, after an absence of nearly sixteen years, bringing with him two of his principal creditors, with a view of sounding my inclinations. I was easily persuaded into the propriety of meeting my father's wishes by promoting the payment of his debts. As nothing more could then be done I was soon left to my former pursuits; but I had stipulated for being sent to college immediately. The expences of a college residence being to be defrayed from my own fortune, without in the slightest degree touching upon my father's, he readily acquiesced, and, still under the care of Perceval, who was little more than a useful tool, I was entered at ——— college in Oxford.

The exploits of boys, who fancy themselves to be men, afford little or nothing worth recording. I have no doubt that I was as empty and conceited as the rest, but as it was my whole fortune that occupied my mind, I took no pains whatever to forestall it; and that it might burst upon me at once, I took care not to exceed my regular allowance, which, by the bye, was not so liberal as it ought to have been. But one of my trustees was a banker and the other a lawyer. The banker connived at the multiplication of law proceedings in return for an enormous balance which was always deposited in his hands, and which he retained with the utmost pertinacity, to the exclusion of the comforts and appearance corresponding to my rank.

I left the University about four months before I came of age. My father then summoned me to London to forward his own views. But as I am now launching into what is generally denominated life, I shall make my entrance into London in a fresh chapter.

CHAP. III.

FRIENDSHIP.

ON my arrival in the metropolis, I found myself transported into a new world. To a youthful and ardent mind, brought up in the shades of retirement, and whose excursions had never extended beyond the verge of a college, the bustle of a capital must necessarily impart the most delightful sensations. That vacancy which is occasioned by quitting familiar scenes, is speedily filled by continued novelty, before the eye has long viewed the passing crowds engaged in the active employments of life. The interval which elapses between the commencement of enjoyment and the approach of satiety, is perhaps the most gratifying which the mind can experience.

The prospect of a speedy payment served to exhilarate those to whom my father was indebted, and induced them to advance a further supply, which enabled him to receive his son in a style becoming his expectations. The town mansion once more assumed a splendid appearance; the rooms, which by successive executions had been relieved from their gaudy trappings, were again decorated with flimsy finery, chosen more for its dazzling quality than its substantiality. Every thing that could gratify and catch the attention of youth was placed before my eyes and within my reach; every endeavour was made to banish thought from my breast, and to keep me in a state of continued pleasure. For a time I was in an imaginary paradise, and was tempted to believe that my joys were of a lasting nature. I heard of little else but the supreme felicity attending the possession of a large fortune, together with the gratification to be derived from the uncontrolled power of spending it as fancy should dictate. No one could have a right to blame my profusion if I wasted it, and no one could accuse me of parsimony if I chose to preserve it. Happy! happy independence. But in all this there was nothing new: every heir, from Noah downwards has, I apprehend, met with a similar reception, whenever his signature has been essential in the docking of an entail. The necessities of the Earl of Erpingham called for the assistance of his son the Lord Viscount Winterbourne, and the touch of Lord Viscount Winterbourne was allowed to be magical. His hand to the parchment, like the blow upon the rock, could make that which was most wanted flow in abundance, and Lord Viscount Winterbourne, like the Jewish lawgiver was only estimated by his power of complying with the demands of others.

Hitherto my days had glided on in an unvaried current, differing only as to the situation in which I drank the cup of pleasure, but as it was necessary that I should not only have been born, but actually trained to manhood, before I could take possession of my property, it was as necessary that I should so inform the reader, particularly if he happens to be one of those who are sparing in the employment of their powers of ratiocination ; he might otherwise have supposed, that Minerva-like, I started full grown from my father's brain. God knows, although my father might pass muster in the common herd of mortals, he had few qualifications that would entitle him to a seat in Olympus.

It was determined by those whose reign was about to be at an end, that my attaining the age of maturity and independence should be celebrated at Bingwood Abbey, with a strict adherence to the ceremonials prescribed by the admirers of true old English hospitality. To this plan I had no other objection than leaving the metropolis, for the amusements and allurements of which I had begun to acquire a considerable relish, that was rather increasing than diminishing. Reflecting however within myself, that it would be the last time that I should have to submit to the control of either my father or my trustees, I consented with the best grace I could assume. I was induced to do so the more readily as I plainly perceived that my lawyer trustee, who was an attorney of very extensive practice and high reputation, and of brutality of manners and snarling ill-nature equal to his practice, had made up his mind to the mode of proceeding.

Mr. Bearblock, the lawyer in question, had obtained a high character for honesty by an assumed bluntness, which intimidated those for whom he was concerned from inspecting their own affairs; he therefore cheated with impunity and without suspicion. He had contrived to keep within himself the management of my affairs, the banker's balance excepted; it was in his power, therefore, to have thwarted and vexed me with endless litigation had I ventured in this instance to have disobliged him; and I am satisfied that had I roused the spirit of discontent within him, he would have annoyed me to the utmost of his power.

Another thing that reconciled me to a temporary banishment from the gaieties of the metropolis, was the promise of being accompanied by a young man who had suddenly become an extraordinary favourite with my father. He had insensibly wound himself into my confidence, and I thought nothing right which was not sanctioned by the exquisite taste and correct judgment of Charles Villiers.

My new friend and factotum Charles Villiers, was one of those characters frequently to be met with in the higher circles, to which they are necessary appendages. Sprung from the lord knows who, come from the lord knows where, and received into society the lord knows why, he had made his way on a familiar footing into the houses of the principal nobility and gentry. Without possessing any visible means of existence, he supported the appearance of a gentleman, and was in all companies treated as such. He neither possessed brilliant talents, nor any of the fashionable accomplishments, and I can describe him in no other way than by saying that he had a person by no means disagreeable, which was set off to the best advantage by the aid of dress; that he was a useful “walk-in gentleman” in filling an assembly, and setting off the more prominent characters; that he had a bow and a cringe for every one proportioned in its profoundness to the rank of the party; that he was an agreeable and indefatigable listener to the harangues and dissertations of others, however tedious, monotonous, or unmeaning; and that the few words he uttered were judiciously selected to the advancement of his own interest, for they chiefly consisted of compliments to the understanding and abilities of both the present and the absent.

I speak of him as I found him in the sequel. At the first acquaintance I considered him as a man of solid understanding, from whom I might derive the greatest advantage in my outset in life. I felt conscious of my want of experience, which I thought it was in his power to remedy. By his knowledge of the world, I intended to frame my conduct and behaviour; he would, I conceived, be able to guard me against those snares which, in my moments of wisdom, I imagined, would be spread out in every direction to entrap me; and he would put me in the way of enjoying pleasure with the least possible portion of alloy.

My partiality for him I have no doubt was in great measure occasioned, perhaps entirely so, by overhearing him observe to Lady Selina Derwent, to whom he was addressing his discourse, while her ladyship was recovering her breath, which she had just exhausted in talking, that "Lord Winterbourne was, without exception, one of the most sensible and agreeable young men he had ever had the honour of conversing with, and that he plainly foresaw that his lordship would prove one of the brightest ornaments to his age and country." Every person at some period or other of his life has felt that kind of inward joy which is diffused by the countenance which disinterested observers afford to self-complacency in cases like the present. The back of Villiers was turned towards me, and I did not think it possible that he could be aware of my being within the sound of his voice. Lady Selina had recovered her wind by the time Villiers had made an end of his eulogy, and immediately gave a new turn to the conversation. I could never, therefore, exactly find out whether her ladyship coincided with him in the high sense which he seemed to entertain of my extraordinary merits.

Some poet or other observes that "All men think all men mortal but themselves;" in like manner there are few among my readers who have not the highest opinion of their own abilities, and who do not feel the highest gratification at a compliment being paid to their understanding. It is in this way that a vain man is easily led to deceive himself, although he may easily detect an imposition which any one may attempt to practise upon him. With his own personal charms every one is satisfied, even those to whom nature has been most niggardly in the distribution of beauty. The glass affords the power of drawing a comparison between self, the standard of perfection and the rest of the world. "I would not be so tall as that fellow for the universe," said a Lilliputian, who was vainly endeavouring to lift his umbrella over the head of an inhabitant of Brobdingnag. "What a miserable thing to be no higher than a curb stone," retorted he of Brobdingnag with a look of contempt, as the edge of the umbrella touched his nose. "I know," said an hero of ugliness, "that my features are not what may be termed strictly regular, but there is a certain something,—an air of expression, a je ne sçai quoi, which renders me altogether irresistible.”

These candidates for the ugly club are daily to be met with : I remember a dowager on the wrong side of sixty, who might have passed, for the daughter of Goliath, and the sister of the Irish giant, and who with a coarse brown face, seamed with the small pox, which had demolished the eyebrows and eyelashes,—with only one tooth which started horizontally from the upper gum, as well as some other appearances and peculiarities that altogether proclaimed her being more nearly allied to Mars than to Venus, or to Erynnis than either,—this fair damsel had attracted the observation of one of her granddaughters, by the profusion of party coloured ribbons and gauzes, with which she had decorated her lovely person; the young lady modestly observed that for her part she admired her grand mamma most in her morning dress. “Jealousy, child!” retorted the antiquated dame, “besides when one’s naturally showy a little sets one off.”

By a general invitation to my father’s house, I gave to Villers every opportunity that he could desire of acquiring an influence over my mind, and actions. In a few weeks that influence became unbounded in its extent, and I was merely a puppet of which he moved the wires. “Such a proceeding is beneath a man of your sense;”—“a man of your highly cultivated understanding should accustom himself to view every thing in its true light, stripped of the covering which deceives the silly part of mankind.”—“It is not every one who is capable of separating the dross from the metal: it is therefore proper for those who like yourself are eminently gifted with the powers of perception, to hold out an example of prudence and consistency." These and other observations of a similar tendency, were so often reiterated in my ears, that I was at last thoroughly satisfied with my own mental qualifications, and of course tamely submitted to be made a fool in every thing.

A thorough knowledge of the town and its ways, could not fail of rendering Villiers a pleasant acquisition to one desirous of experiencing its pleasures, and enjoying its luxuries. A perfect master in the art of dissimulation, and an adept in the science of persuasion, Villiers well knew how to keep my passions constantly upon the alert. They were apparently gratified by his means, and by them only. He hung about me to the absolute exclusion of a young man of fortune's prime minister, his Valet de chambre. It was in vain my gentleman urged the dignity of his post, and that he alone should be entrusted with commissions of a delicate nature; I was inflexible, for "it was improper to repose confidence in domestics, who only seek their master's secrets to betray them, or to get them in their power."

Villiers kindly undertook to direct my pleasures, and also told me when I ought to be pleased, and when a pursuit was "beneath my dignity." He procured me the means of enjoying such gratifications as corresponded "with my rank," and what was still kinder, when it met his approbation he partook of the enjoyment.

Who could do too much for such a valued and valuable friend? and what recompence could be deemed adequate for such important services? Indeed, he was become absolutely necessary to my existence, for in his absence, which was but seldom the case, I frequently doubted whether I had any sense or not, and I have no hesitation in saying, that I suspected myself to be a fool, long before the usual time fixed for our ~~entertaining~~ such suspicion by a celebrated poet in his account of "procrastination."

CHAP IV.

CONFIDENCE.

THE happy period of emancipation was now rapidly approaching, and preparations were made for our departure to Bingwood. My father, to prevent, I suppose, future trouble, had wished the entail to be cut off from the whole of the Erpingham property; some parts, he urged, could be sold to great advantage, and other estates more convenient might be purchased, thus adding materially to the compactness, beauty, and value, of the chief domain. He had, by some means or other, made a friend of Villiers, who cordially entered into his plans for improvement. Villiers soon led me to be of opinion that entails of property were national evils, and that every sensible mind would discard such a wretched remnant of ancient barbarism: "it was the greatest drawback to the advancement of a state." I had got by heart numerous instances of rapid amelioration, where facility was given to the free interchange of property of all descriptions, I could compare the situation of England before and after the reign of Henry VII., and I could trace the degraded situation of Spain, Portugal, and some other parts of the Continent of Europe, to the narrow policy of their rulers in strictly adhering to the allodial tenure, which made the impoverished land-owner the oppressor of his tenantry, by wringing large supplies from their slender means, in lieu of disposing of a part to benefit and preserve the remainder from ruin and devastation.

With the prospect of again enjoying the delights of profusion, my father's spirits were elevated to the highest pitch, and in their exuberance he incautiously told me in the presence of Villiers, that he should have to thank me for his future means of existence, for that every part of his property was mortgaged for his life, and that his debts were besides of very considerable amount.

I had accidentally cast my eyes towards Villiers at the conclusion of the Earl's speech, when I thought I perceived a turn in his countenance, which rather surprized me ; his looks in general were placid in the extreme, but he now appeared transfixed by a sudden thought. Nothing further occurred at the time ; the lawyers were directed to prepare the necessary deeds, to be in readiness on our return to town. The principal creditors, with a view no doubt to the general interest, had ingeniously carved out some of the most capital estates among themselves.-- Nothing but my signature was wanting to render every thing complete, by stripping the noble and ancient house of Erpingham of the means by which its dignity could be maintained.

The journey to Bingwood was as rapid as the unbending particularity of my lawyer trustee would admit; he accompanied my father and myself in the coach, the fourth seat of which was occupied by my confidential adviser. My banker trustee engaged to meet us on the spot. In the course of our progress Mr. Bearblock entertained my father with a lecture on imprudence, and myself with exhortations to avoid embarrassment in money matters, referring me to my father as an illustration of his elaborate arguments in favour of economy. The Earl grew peevish and testy: the lawyer answered him by preaching patience, and by urging the necessity of probing a wound to effect a cure. I felt for my father, and would have silenced the lawyer, but I was only reminded, "that youthful folly should never set itself in opposition to grey hairs." My father was more than once inclined to send the lawyer to the — before his time, by chucking him out of the coach window, but the latter wisely suffered the storm to blow over him, and waited in quietness until there was a fresh opportunity for carrying on hostilities. The fact, I believe, was, that the Earl and Mr. Bearblock had never cordially agreed, and the latter seeing the sceptre about to fall from his hand, was unwilling to quit the government without some exertion of his power. Villiers acted as the mediator, and in the absence of the lawyer begged my father to keep his temper and bear with the brute, who unfortunately was possessed of the means of rendering every person uncomfortable at a time of general festivity; a few hours, and the lawyer might be treated as he deserved. My father followed the advice, and towards the latter part of the way, Mr. Bearlock, finding that his remarks ceased to give a visible annoyance, but that the Earl treated him with silent contempt, sought for refuge within himself and went to sleep.

The demonstrations of joy were such as are usual on similar events. The bells, two of which were cracked, rung incessantly a discordant peal; the tenantry and labourers proclaimed a general holiday, and stunned our ears with endless congratulations and repeated huzzas. During the whole morning, "the many rent the skies with loud applause," and with ceaseless vociferations cleared their throats for devouring the oxen which were roasting whole, and for swallowing the strong beer which had been brewed of an extraordinary strength for the occasion; every drop of which was drank—or wasted. The whole was conducted with the utmost regularity of disorder, and was succeeded by the usual portion of aching and broken heads; but notwithstanding all the noise and bustle, I can recollect nothing at this distance of time which is worthy of recital, except that on the morning following that of my arrival at years of discretion, my trustees delivered to me the full possession of the Bingwood estates, amounting to upwards of fourteen thousand per annum, together with the savings of a long minority which, at the price of the funded property at that period, they stated to exceed two hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling, including the balance in the hands of my banker trustee.

I was pressed to an early examination of the accounts, in order that general releases might be given. On our way down Villiers had pointed out the necessity of a strict investigation, but he now reminded me that I had property enough, and that it would be an action becoming my situation to give the releases at the moment of general joy. The great amount of the savings was a proof in itself of the correctness of the accounts, and of the unimpeachable honesty of the trustees. "Besides," he added, "suspicion is always a proof of a weak mind." Villiers seemed to have a heart formed for friendship, for he was the dear friend of the lawyer, and the particular friend of the banker.

I must do myself the justice to say that I suspected all was not right, but as weakness of mind, was a thing of all others of which I most dreaded the imputation, I signed the necessary discharges without hesitation. I had afterwards good reason to repent of my hastiness, but it was too late.

The lawyer and the banker having now nothing to detain them, prepared to leave us, and my father full of his own affairs pressed me to accompany him to London without loss of time. But Villiers was of opinion that a further stay was necessary for my own consequence. With a view to separate me from my father, and to delay my journey to town, Villiers proposed to me to take a cursory survey of the different estates of which I was now the absolute master. "It was incumbent upon every man of sense," I was told, "to look into his own affairs." I therefore examined my terra firma, but through the eyes and with the sentiments of my companion. This operation consumed more time than the Earl liked. As I felt that I was acting like a man of sense, I gave a decided negative to my father's proposition of instantly leaving Bingwood. He left me in anger, but I promised to follow him in a few days.

The old steward had contrived to get the principal farms into the hands of himself and family. It was not likely, therefore, that I should dissent from the opinion of Villiers, "that he was unfit to be further trusted." His discharge immediately followed, but not without a long lecture from Villiers upon honesty and integrity. My friend proposed to save the salary of a steward and to collect the rents himself: "twice a year such an excursion would be pleasant; besides," added he, "I shall then be able to discover and counteract any underhand and unfair dealings."

Such a steward was an invaluable treasure. Underhand and unfair dealings had been discovered, and it was a matter of importance to prevent their recurrence. Having arranged for my own landed property by publicly instituting my friend in his new office, and desiring that his commands and directions should in every instance be implicitly obeyed, I intended returning to town to settle the affairs with my father. Being in the country, however, and at no very great distance from Erpingham, it would have been a "great proof of folly," not to examine a little into a property I had been destined to inherit, particularly as I was about to renounce my exclusive claim to it; "no man of sense," said the same individual, who had recommended my giving the discharge to my trustees, "would put his hand to what he did not thoroughly understand." This was indisputable, and we proceeded to Erpingham, to which place I had been hitherto a stranger.

The impression made upon my mind by the first view of the mansion inherited from my paternal ancestors, is not in my power to describe. From an eminence which overlooked the park and extensive domain, the whole burst upon me in an instant, and I cannot help acknowledging the inward pride with which I contemplated my patrimony. Every thing before me was gigantic but proportioned. The house, the lawns, the lakes, the woods, and the deer parks, were formed on the same magnificent scale. Nature had been profuse in affording opportunities for the display of art, and art had been judiciously applied to the embellishment of nature. The genius of Brown had here soared to its nearest approach to perfection and had converted discord into sweetest harmony.

Villiers perceived how much I was affected by the scene before me? "This," said he, "is indeed a noble prospect! Here imagination has room to revel! Here is indeed an excuse for pride!"

The thought of what I had promised embarrassed me, for I had yet to learn the value of professions. I would willingly have recalled my word to my father, and to have preserved untouched the property before me I verily believe that at the moment I could have sacrificed my existence.

Villiers, since our departure from Bingwood, had ceased to be the encomiast of my father. He had occasionally made remarks upon the Earl's extravagance, and blaming his profuse expenditure, had expressed doubts whether the whole estates, turned into money would be sufficient to clear him from his debts. My pride caught the alarm, and I began to be awakened to a sense of my own interest. I balanced in my mind, the consequences of what I had agreed to perform, and I contemplated my future prospects, when at the decease of my father I should succeed to his titles, without the means of maintaining grandeur. My ideas had taken such a lofty flight, that I considered my Bingwood property only as a good bachelor's provision, but wholly inadequate to the support of nobility. Had I been told that the fortune of many noblemen was considerably less than what I at present possessed, I should in all probability have shrugged up my shoulders and pitied them.

Another view of the superb domain, which I had an opportunity of enjoying from a different situation, and which if possible, exhibited it to more advantage, fixed my wavering determination. I resolved on no account to part with a single acre, and at last worked myself to such a pitch of enthusiasm, that I fancied myself in the actual possession, and already commenced some imaginary improvements. I felt that I could partially relieve my father with my personal property, without in the slightest degree inconveniencing myself. His debts I knew must die with himself, and I was not so ignorant of the ways of the world as to be unaware that the tradesman who trusts nobility, does it upon the calculation that the living will pay for the dead. His creditors had trusted him with their eyes open, and they had no right to reckon upon my discharging embarrassments which I had no share in creating. I did not apprehend that my father was overwhelmed with any extraordinary nicety of feeling; he would otherwise have avoided placing himself in so painful a situation. If I retained the property, the latter part of my father's life would still be rendered comfortable, and at his death the family estates would be delivered to me clear and unincumbered.

Under these impressions, I wrote to my father, desiring him to proceed no farther in the business, but that on my return to London, I would do every thing in my power to render him comfortable in his circumstances.

The time thus consumed in traversing the Erpingham estates, were perhaps the only days I ever experienced after my arrival at maturity in which pleasure was free from alloy, for the arrangements with my father gave me no pain, as I conceived myself to be acting in strict conformity to my duty. As yet I had tasted only the blessings of wealth; but its curses had already visited me, although it was without my being aware of it, for I had placed an unlimited confidence in a most consummate scoundrel.

The weather was clear and open, and notwithstanding my eagerness again to plunge into metropolitan luxuries, I insensibly lingered round the "hall of my ancestors." I did not inform my father of my intention of remaining here, nor did I fix a specific time for being in London. I suppose he took the chances of a letter reaching me, for in the course of post I received one to the following purport :

“ Come instantly to town. You are the dupe of a designing villain. Do not delay a moment.

“ ERPINGHAM.”

My confidence was not easily to be shaken. The same blind obstinacy in which I persevered when resentment was once kindled, was equally strong in the pertinacious adherence in a former opinion until a change had been effected in my sentiments.

The alteration visible in the countenance of Villiers on my handing him the letter, I attributed to honest manly rage, at an unjust insinuation. I considered my father as plotting against me, and looked upon Villiers as my guardian angel. It was through his advice that I had been induced to preserve my property from being scattered like chaff before the wind. My father I thought would readily believe that on such an occasion, friendship could only lead to one side, and the disinterested friend of his son must of consequence be his own enemy. Besides, my father's views had been thwarted, and that in itself was sufficient to infuriate him.

“Do you suppose me,” said Villiers after he had cast his eyes over the concise epistle,—“do you suppose me to be the wretch your father would wish you to believe?”

“What reason have I for the supposition? Your conduct hitherto has certainly not justified it.”

“However,” he continued, “go to your father;—it is your duty. Throw away your inheritance;—It is his wish. Run yourself headlong to ruin;—you will please him. But the villain before you shall never be a witness to your folly. Adieu! be careful how you again associate with such villains as myself."

Villiers abruptly left the room, and I had lost my presence of mind too far to prevent him. His absence was not long, for he returned within a few minutes, to part, as he said, on friendly terms with the only person whose good opinion he had ever valued, and for whom he had ever felt a disinterested regard.

"I do not blame your father," he observed, "nor do I arraign his motives. It shall never be said that I have estranged the child from the parent. I wish to respect your father. I respect his son. I know the goodness of his son's heart. I would have deserved their mutual esteem—but —farewell!"

"Stay my friend," I exclaimed, "blame not the son for the father's fault. Besides, my father is acting from a mistaken impulse. Nothing more remains to be done here ; let us go to London, every thing can then be explained."

" What ! to appear before the father of my friend with the imputation of a villain ? Never, my Lord Winterbourne ! It is your duty to follow your father's directions : it is my duty to behave with becoming dignity in what concerns myself."

" My father has been deceived ; he will gladly acknowledge his error."

" Granted ! but if your father was weak enough to be deceived, and mean enough to apologize where no apology ought to be due, think you that I can countenance the deception and tacitly admit the truth of the charge, by again holding intercourse with a man who has so cruelly traduced me."

" An explanation is due to your character, and my father cannot refuse it."

" No, my Lord ! a blow inflicted on so tender a part cannot be healed by explanation. My hands are tied. He is the father of my valued friend who has wounded me! you are his security. But by the living God—but no matter. Again, my Lord, farewell! I see you would persuade me, but I am fixed and determined. You may one day be able to estimate the character of a villain. Here, my Lord, is my book of accounts, and in this paper you will find the balance remaining in my hands; there is no occasion for any discharge in this instance. If an incorrectness appears which I am not aware of, it shall be rectified.”

I would have detained him, but there appeared an air of determination in his manner, which convinced me that all my persuasion would be ineffectual. Holding out my hand, he received his, and then suffered him to depart in silence. Villiers had previously made a discovery of his absence.

lute power over my mind, which only rendered him more anxious to rivet the fetters by a temporary absence.

The languor and ennui I felt on being thus deserted are indescribable. Left to myself my time hung upon my hands with a dreadful weight. The rides and walks in which I had so lately delighted, suddenly lost all their charms. A continuance at Erpingham was insupportable; and yet I dreaded to return to London, fearful of becoming the tool of my father. I had been taught to suspect my servants, and cautioned against the "weakness," of trusting hired domestics. They were estranged from me, and there was not a soul with whom I could hold intercourse. At last, feeling that any alteration must be for the better, I resolved to change the scene, and if possible to regain my former companion and bosom friend.

With this view, attended only by a groom, who was my foster brother, and who had shown numerous marks of an ardent attachment for my person, I set off for London, intending to keep my arrival a secret from every one, and particularly from my father. On Giles I thought I could place the most implicit confidence. Never having been in London, his person was unknown to my father's household; I could therefore employ him in the double capacity of servant and spy. Giles had been bred up with me from his infancy, and when he ceased to be my playfellow he became my attendant, until his propensity to the stable led him to seek the situation of groom. He had refused all offers of advancement, and appeared to have no ambition beyond his present station. In addition to a good heart, Giles had an open disposition, was of an athletic make, and prided himself upon being what is termed a lover of fun.

I must acknowledge that I greatly deceived myself in my supposed motives for this private journey. I wished to believe that it was an act of prudence which would enable me to discover the real state of my father's affairs. But it was Villiers alone I wanted. My father, his affairs, my magnificent prospects, all vanished from before me, leaving a dreary waste, which Villiers alone could convert into a fruitful region.

I took great credit to myself, for my wise precaution in misleading my attendants, by informing them that I was merely going to Bingwood to visit my former tutor, commanding them to wait at Erpingham for my further directions.

To my astonishment, previous to my departure, a young man named William Peters, whom Villiers had placed about my person, and to whom I had insensibly become attached for his constant and unremitting attention, requested his immediate discharge, unless he were permitted to accompany me. His attachment, he said, would render a separation intolerable, and if he were not allowed to attend me he should think that I considered him no longer worthy of his situation.

My natural disposition here bore forth. Thinking that what he said appeared as if he was dictating to me, I gave him no answer, but directed him to name the amount of his wages which I paid him without a single remark, determining in my own mind that his character should pay the price of what I considered his insolence.

CHAP. V.PHYSIOGNOMY.

SUFFICIENTLY wary to prevent a spy upon my actions, although I did not conceive there was any thing remarkable in my conduct, I set off from Erpingham on my way to Bingwood, but at the first intersection I struck into the London road. Giles and myself were mounted on horseback. We had rather more than one hundred and fifty miles to travel, which we proposed to accomplish in three days, calculating that the horses would have ample time to recover from their exertion at thier journey's end. I had now an object in view which was capable of occupying my mind. The journey was delightful; it was true, I was in a great measure left to my own thoughts, but the fatigue of riding rendered my sleep sound at night, and the continued change of scene amused me in the day time. Besides, I now reflected on my actual situation. I had a large sum in ready money, with an unincumbered estate of fourteen thousand a year in possession, an estate of three times that amount in reversion. I was wholly free from controul, and nothing was apparently wanting to make me the happiest of the happy. It is not to be wondered at, that my mind should have dwelt upon these pleasing prospects, and that I should have felt more and more exhilarated as I approached towards the focus of all that is congenial to the mind of the young, sanguine, and thoughtless.

We travelled onwards with no other interruption than was requisite to afford the necessary repose to man and beast, until we arrived at the first village on the London side of Barnet, where, one of my horse's shoes having become loose, I was under the necessity of stopping at a blacksmith's to have it fastened on. While this operation was performing, I strolled across the way to a little inn, thinking to beguile the time with a newspaper. I had scarcely seated myself at the parlour window, when I perceived William Peters, my discharged servant, pass rapidly by, well mounted on a blood horse. Unperceived by him, I put my head out of the window and saw him speaking to the man belonging to the turnpike gate, which was situated at no great distance from the blacksmith's shed. The gate-keeper's hand was pointed to the shed, seemingly directing the attention of Peters towards it. The latter turned his head to the blacksmith's, but in an instant, as if he had recollected himself, he spurred his horse into a hand gallop and speedily got out of sight.

The appearance of Peters on horseback did not at the time strike me as particularly remarkable; although I might perhaps have wondered a little at seeing him well mounted, and at his travelling with such expedition. I had left him behind me at Erpingham, and I had not loitered upon the road. I caught sight of him again as I got off my horse at the ——— hotel in ——— Street.

The few changes of linen which Giles had brought in his saddle bags were nearly exhausted on the road. But in London, I well knew that every thing could be procured in an instant: the want of a clean shirt therefore would soon be remedied. However, I now discovered a striking instance of my want of foresight, or rather of my want of thought. Giles had fortunately money enough of his own to bear our expences on the road; he had, of course no occasion to apply to me. But his little stock was nearly exhausted as he paid the last turnpike, and he then ventured to mention to me the state of his finances. They were completely disordered, and I was by no means in a condition to furnish him with the ways and means. In losing my confidential companion, I lost my treasurer and purse bearer, and was literally without a single farthing in my pocket. Villiers had, indeed, professed to lay on the table, previous to his departure, the money which he said belonged to me, but I had deposited the purse in my travelling case. I now felt myself in an awkward predicament, as neither Giles nor his master possessed within themselves the art of living upon air, or the science of creating something out of nothing.

My personal property had chiefly been placed in the funds, and my trustees had informed me that it was transferred to my own name ; but I was wholly unacquainted with the means of disposing of any part. Independent of my ignorance of the mode of raising money in this way, I was wise enough to be aware that it would be requisite to identify my person, which did not suit with my present views of privacy.

The balance in the hand of my banker trustee was likewise placed to my own account, but I had completely forgotten the name of the firm, and besides they must be unacquainted with my hand writing. The sale of the horses seemed the only feasible way, under present circumstances, of satisfying present wants and providing a small supply for the future. But Giles was a total stranger in London, and a complete novice in the ways of the world. To live without money was next to impossible. To procure it, I sent for the landlord of the hotel, and told him that I wished to sell the horses immediately, but that my servant had never been in London before, and that I did not wish to be seen at all in the business. Mine host viewed me with an eye of suspicion, and left the room with the look of a person who felt that he had discovered a secret, telling me that he would send for a horse dealer.

I sat down to ruminate on my future plans, satisfied that the sale of my horses would furnish me with the means of preserving me incognito, for at least some time to come, and was debating within myself whether my first endeavours should be directed towards Villiers or towards my father. But before I could arrive at any satisfactory conclusion, Giles made his appearance, seemingly bruised from head to foot. He informed me that the people of the house had been questioning him closely; "but," said Giles, "they got nothing out of me; I've told'em lies by the score. One man laughed and said my master's time was pretty well come; another said, that I were too pretty a lad to be hanged yet. I told him that might be a Lunnun compliment, but it was a sort of a thing in our country we should answer in this way, said I, laying him as flat as a pancake upon the floor. Another then laid hold of me by the collar, but I sent he after'tother. Then all hell broke loose, so I fought my way through them, to tell ye all about it, for I heard some of 'em talking of a constable and a warrant."

During the recital of Giles's tale, my indignation at this treatment of my servant advanced to the highest pitch, and I turned in my mind the most effectual mode of revenging the insult. I could not altogether acquit Giles of blame, in probably giving vent to a great deal of nonsense, in answer to enquiries proceeding from mere curiosity; but my charge to him not to let me be known on any consideration, was an excuse, if not sufficient to free him from censure, at least enough to palliate the offence. Giles had hardly concluded his narrative, when an ill-looking man entered the room, and without the ceremony of an introduction, or announcing his business, advanced towards me. He viewed me from head to foot, scrutinizing my features with the eyes of a lynx. He looked from time to time at a printed paper which he held in his hand, muttering to himself as he alternately perused me and the hand bill.

“He answers the description,” said my new visitor, calling to some person without, "but you had better see him yourself. You may be able to swear to him."

Giles and myself sought for information in the looks of each other, but there was nothing which could afford it. Farther light was, however, thrown upon the affair by the entrance of a little herring gutted animal, accompanied among others by a jolly buxom dame of forty or thereabouts, dressed in flaming yellow from top to toe. A pair of light grey eyes twinkled under a low forehead, and that forehead was surmounted by an immense toupée. The reader will bear in mind that I was then forty years younger than I am at the present moment, and that I speak of the delectable dresses of the day, when every head supported a living colony of freebooters,—when every contact of heads afforded opportunity for emigration,— and when a mouse could wanton without discovery in a lady's curl.

"Pray, dear Mr. Constable," said the lady, "hold the ~~w~~illain fast; I would not be frit so again, no not for never so much. Oh! its him, I'll take my bible oath on't. Mr. Ninethman, vy dont you swear to him?"

"Vy lovee, an oath is a matter of conscience, and the pious Mr. Barebones, says, swear not at all. Besides I trimbled so."

"A fiddlestick for Mr. Barebones," cried the lady swelling like a turkey cock, and almost bursting with rage; "he has picked your pocket enough already, you snivelling puppy! You a man, quotha! You can look at a thief that vill vheedle you out of your money, while ——."

"When this farce is ended," said I haughtily, and with as much dignity as I could possibly assume, "I suppose you will all have the goodness to quit the room. If this is your public room, landlord, I desire a private one?"

"Oh!" said a coxcomb, who had made his entry with the rest, "pray let the gentleman be private, constable! Gad he is the first I ever heard of that was in a hurry for a condemned cell."

My countenance, I imagine began to make a terrific appearance, for the puppy to avoid probably a derangement of his sweet person made a hasty retreat towards the door.

"If so be as how the gemman, is a gemman," said another blackguard looking fellow, "he need vant for nothing, and if he chuses to pay for a coach to the office, ve shan't press for his valking. Nobody knows more betterer than ve vat's due to a gemman. But mayhap the gemman may like a glass of vine, or a flash of lightening, before he goes."

“ Yes! yes!” said the lady in yellow.
“ He is a pretty gentleman, indeed, his very looks would hang him!”

Giles had discovered by this time that this extraordinary discourse was levelled at myself. Indignant at such language being directed to his master, and being too much of a Briton to strike a woman, he coolly vented his rage upon her unoffending spouse, whom he civilly and without noise or ceremony extended at his length upon the ground. This, to be sure, was not a work of much difficulty, considering the disproportion in the muscular powers of the parties; but Giles had only intended it as conveying his intention of becoming the champion of his master's cause. He had now begun the affray, and he was ready to maintain his share in the conflict which he had roused.

The constable, for such was my first visitor, to prevent further mischief, and to secure one of his prisoners at least, from the possibility of escape, as well as to avenge the cause of the recumbent tailor, prepared himself, by collecting his strength, to place Giles in a similar situation. A mighty blow was projected from a pair of Herculean shoulders, which, had it lighted where it was intended, would have placed my co-adjutor completely hors de combat. But as no one could be more aware than Giles, although no coward, that the “better part of valour is discretion,” he wisely stooped his head, and suffered the compliment intended for him to pass with diminished force to the puppy before-mentioned. The blow was doubly effective: it not only levelled the object who received it, but, extended its force according to the rules of percussion, to my friend in yellow the amiable Mrs. Ninethman. The lady falling by the natural laws of gravity, furnished, unwillingly, an enviable resting place to the reclining beau. The constable, who by over reaching himself in missing Giles, had almost lost his balance, was easily precipitated on the recumbent pair, by a slight motion from Giles's fist.

These events passed in such rapid succession, that I could hardly believe the scene to be real, particularly when looking to the opposite side to that which had hitherto been the hottest part of the battle, I perceived that the landlord and the constable's companion, had been equally the victims of Giles's prowess; the latter having seized at the same moment the leg on which each was then placing the most dependence, and thus accomplished their overthrow.

“Now, my lord,” said Giles, forgetting himself for the first time, “the coast is clear.”

“At the sound of “my lord,” my prostrate enemies were aghast. I could perceive the lower jaws gradually descend. Every eye was directed towards me in a vacant unmeaning stare, but not one of the party seemed capable of resuming the perpendicular posture.

I can form no idea of the time the reclining parties would have remained in their present position. The uniformity of the scene was, however, interrupted by the sudden and unexpected entrance of Villiers.

Nothing could exceed his astonishment as he viewed the field of battle. "Heyday! my Lord," said he, "this is taking London by storm; the whole world, at this rate, would be unable to withstand you and your lieutenant-general."

By this time the landlord had regained his footing, and being acquainted with Villiers, asked "if the gentleman was known to him, for he had appeared under very suspicious circumstances."

“ Know him,” replied Villiers, “ aye old Boniface, and so will all of you know him to your cost. But to save trouble and circumlocution, he is Viscount Winterbourne, the possessor of twenty thousand a year in his own right, and eldest son to the earl of Erpingham.”

Dismay seized every countenance. By degrees the leading personages were on their legs. The constable's assistant was the first to retreat, leaving his principal to make peace for both. The constable hoped my honour would consider that he was only acting according to his duty, which he always took as the guide of his conduct ; then without waiting for a reply, he followed the example of his comrade. The lady and her husband had regained their footing, by the assistance of the landlord. The husband would have made good his retreat, without the ceremony of taking leave, but his wife caught him by the arm, and taking some cards from his pocket “purtested that she was vastly sorry for vhat had happened, and vondered how the constable could be so blind, seeing as how nobility was written upon my forehead.” She further said, that although her husband looked so like a fool, he was one of the best tailors in London for strong vork ; and assured me, that I should find the very best of treatment in Round Court.

† The landlord retreated in his turn, leaving only the gentleman who would have sent me to the condemned hole. He was setting his face for a long train of apologies, but seeing Giles in the act of opening the window, he prudently made to the door, as by far the pleasantest way of ejection.

CHAP. VI.

DETERMINATION.

THUS freed from my intruders, I immediately held out my hand to welcome Villiers, and in the joy of my heart thanked him for his timely interference, which had saved me from an awkward exposure. I did not give him time to reply, but told him that he must forget our former difference, which was solely occasioned by his own hastiness, and that he must replace himself upon his former footing.

Villiers assured me that my interest had been the sole object of his incessant attention. If I suspected him, I injured him. There were, however, in consequence of my father's letter, some particular points, the discussion of which must be reserved for a future occasion. Our agreement or disagreement upon them, would, he said, determine the continuance or final close of our friendship and intimacy. It was true he was not rich, but he was independent in principle, and his honour and self-approbation were dearer to him than life. The latter he would willingly lose for me, but the two former he would forfeit for no man, nor would he for an instant continue an acquaintance, where the purity of his intentions were doubted.

When victory had declared herself on our side, and when the field of battle was left in our possession, without a chance of its being again disputed, Giles made his way to the scene of his early exploits, to enjoy the fruits of his conquest, or, in other words, to exult over the vanquished. From him I could not expect to encrease my stock of information, but as I was desirous of learning the cause of the strange occurrences to which I had just been witness, I requested Villiers to make the necessary inquiries. During his absence, the folly and thoughtlessness of my conduct rushed forcibly upon my mind. I had set out with the intention of investigating the circumstances of others, and from want of experience had thrown myself into a most unpleasant situation, from which, but for the opportune arrival of Villiers, I should not have been able to extricate myself, without a considerable degree of difficulty, and without a total failure of my plans. Since I have seen more of the world, and of its ways, I have ceased to wonder at the state of surveillance which the line of proceeding I had adopted had in a great measure warranted. I was now thoroughly convinced, notwithstanding all my sense and abilities, which were to render me an ornament to my age and country, how totally unfit I was, in every respect, to be my own guide, and how necessary to my future comfort and happiness was the society of a disinterested friend, well versed in “men and manners,” and on whose judgment I could safely rely. What a proof had Villiers given me of the extreme delicacy of his friendship, by quitting me, at the first moment that an attempt was made to poison my mind against him.

The unexpected appearance of Villiers did not occur to me as at all extraordinary, I only thought of the happy effects of his interposition ; and it was a considerable time afterwards that I learnt the cause of my then seeing him. Peters, it appeared, had been left a spy upon my actions, with directions on no account to lose sight of me for an instant. Villiers, instead of going to London as he proposed to do when we parted, concealed himself in the neighbourhood of Erpingham, and with the assistance of Peters, whom he had mounted for the occasion, and who left directions for his employer at every place on the road, had arrived in London, and was at the hotel a few minutes after us. I have had my suspicions whether my being considered as a highwayman was not the effect of his instigation. But, be that as it may, the event answered his purpose, and the business altogether made me more than ever his dupe.

Villiers, on his return, informed me that the uproar had been principally occasioned by the prevaricating nonsense which Giles had uttered in the place allotted to the servants. The neighbour and particular friend of the landlord, Mr. Ninethman, the tailor, who was in the practice of driving his loving wife in a one-horse chaise to their villa at Finchley, had been stopped and robbed upon the common two evenings before, by a couple highwaymen. My offering to sell the horses from which Giles and myself had just alighted at the door of the hotel, and wishing that neither myself nor servant should be seen in the business, gave rise to the suspicion. The tailor and his wife, with a constable and his attendant, were sent for to identify and secure the supposed highwaymen.

Thus ended my first outset in the world under my own guidance. From the sublime to the ridiculous, said a once great man, is but a step; and the distance did not appear much greater between a peer and a highwayman. Had I been tried under the code of Napoleon, which presumes every man to be guilty until he can prove his innocence, the distance would have been still less. But thanks to our blessed constitution, every man is considered innocent until the laws of his country declare him to be guilty.

The decided approbation of Villiers was bestowed upon my intention of getting at the knowledge of my father's circumstances, and he kindly undertook to save me the trouble of making the necessary inquiries, by attending to the business himself; but on one condition,—that I should keep my arrival in town a profound secret from my father and his connections, and that I should be entirely guided by his instructions. On these simple conditions, to which it was impossible for me to refuse my assent, he consented again to watch over my interest and take the management of my concerns. The unjust suspicions of my father he could never forgive, but his regard for me had induced him to wave all petty considerations. But he could never associate with me, if by holding intercourse with my father, I tacitly countenanced such an abominable imputation.

He would use his utmost exertions in the development of the Earl's difficulties. My duty would then perhaps lead me to my father: in that case he should have served me to the utmost of his power, consistently with what he considered due to his own character and consequence. He would there take his leave. The Earl was a man equally well acquainted with mankind as himself, and equally capable of guiding me in my career. Besides he (Villiers) had only friendship to recommend him, whereas the Earl would view me with the affection of a parent.

As I could now make use of my friend, there was no occasion to sacrifice two valuable horses for the pittance which necessity might previously have compelled me to accept. The cash business then came under consideration. Villiers could apply to my late trustees in my name, without my being supposed to be in London, and could settle every thing as well as if I had been present in propria persona. They were both acquainted with his person, and with the confidence I reposed in him; many obstacles to my obtaining an immediate supply were thus removed. I addressed a letter to Mr. Bearblock, desiring the lawyer to furnish my friend with all the information in his power respecting my cash and funded property. The sum in the hands of the bankers was amply sufficient to answer every purpose, and as my signature was easily authenticated our wants were readily supplied.

My confinement in the day time became extremely irksome to me; but this was in some measure counterbalanced by the debauchery and dissipation of the night. With a view of affording me amusement, and of preventing the hours hanging too heavily upon my hands,

Villiers led me into every excess of the tavern and bagnio, until I was thoroughly satiated. In a house of the latter description I was an inmate upwards of a week, having been made apprehensive of a discovery at the hotel. At the tavern I constantly met with what Villiers denominated choise companions, but in what their choiceness consisted I could never properly understand. It was neither in their eating nor in their drinking, for they swallowed indiscriminately whatever was put before them, and it certainly was not in their language, for that consisted of stale jests, grossness without wit, and ribaldry without sense. One thing however I remarked; they acted towards Villiers with the most complete subserviency; they were at his beck and call, and came and went at his command. This made me entertain a high opinion of my own consequence, seeing myself so differently treated from those who in dress and appearance were seemingly my equals, and, who, for ought I knew at the time, might have reasons, like myself, for dropping their titles. I observed that Villiers always discharged the reckoning, but I thought that might have arisen from a desire on his part to save his friends all the trouble possible.

The accounts which Villiers laid before me from time to time were absolutely terrifying. My father's difficulties appeared to exceed, as Villiers had predicted, the whole value of the Erpingham estates. To cut off the entail would be madness; it would be only to ruin myself, for my father would still have nothing left. His person was sacred, and I could supply him with every comfort except that of enabling him to enjoy the satisfaction of feeling himself clear from debt.

My mind was fully made up on the business; but unwilling to make to my father a communication which I knew would vex and irritate him, I wished to devolve the task upon Villiers. From this proposition Villiers started with horror. "Do you imagine for an instant, my Lord Winterbourne," said he, "that I can submit to such a degradation. I am your friend, but only to a certain extent. Press me further, and we are strangers."

"Besides," added he, "on so delicate a point the intervention of a third person would render the refusal doubly galling. It would be a tacit acknowledgement of your dependence on the opinion of others. Your father might well blame you if he supposed for an instant that you were acting under the influence and advice of another, instead of from your own conviction. After what has already passed with your father, I ought perhaps to be the last person to urge you to an interview, which is perhaps unavoidable. While

I allow of my anxiety to preserve your friendship and regard, my fears naturally suggest to me the next to certainty that I shall be made the subject of fresh abuse. The villain will probably become a demon, although had he suffered the son to plunge headlong into ruin, with the father he might have been an angel of purity."

I solemnly assured Villiers that it was utterly impossible for any thing to shake the unbounded confidence I reposed in him. It was founded, I said, upon the basis of gratitude and opinion, and was not likely to be disturbed by every trifling breeze of falsehood and scandal.

After revolving in our minds the several plans which presented themselves, in order to select that which on mature consideration appeared the most desirable, we decided that, the communication would be best made in a letter from myself, and that it should be confined to as few words as possible. The Earl would have time to make the best of his disappointment, and if he gave way to passion he could vent it upon whoever happened to come within his reach. I wrote as follows :

“ MY LORD,

“ It is after the most serious reflection upon our respective circumstances, that I am under the painful necessity of informing you, however unpleasant it may be to yourself, that I conceive it an act of duty to myself and family to withhold my consent to arrangements which must infallibly lead to the ruin of an ancient and honourable house. My determination, my Lord, is fixed, and no consideration whatever shall tempt me to depart from it by severing the noble inheritance of my forefathers.

“ As I before informed your Lordship, my personal property shall be at your entire disposal, to promote your happiness in any way you think proper, but beyond that I should lose sight of my own dignity and your real interest.

“ In every sentiment of gratitude and filial affection no one can more abound than

“ Your devoted,

“ WINTERBOURNE.’

I dispatched my letter, by the hand of Giles, with directions to take it in the evening, and simply to leave it with the porter, without a single remark. As it contained neither place nor date it was not very likely that I should have any reply to it. I had been in London upwards of three weeks and during the whole time I had never once thought of the surprise which my unaccountable absence must have occasioned. But as I did not make my appearance before my father at the time he had every reason to expect me in London, he probably anticipated the subject of my letter.

After waiting a few days, to allow my father time to cool, I resolved to go to Erpingham House for the purpose of explaining more fully my reasons. Of my father I was independent in every respect, and I had never experienced from him the slightest paternal solicitude; but there was an indiscrible something of which I stood in awe. I inwardly dreaded the meeting, for I doubted whether on an interview I should be able to maintain my determination, however wisely it had been formed.

My seeking an interview with my father, however, was rather against the opinion of my adviser, but as some trivial occurrences had given him a further insight into my character, and had proved to him that there was no inconsiderable portion of obstinacy lurking at the bottom, which, when called into action might be difficult to smother, he did not use much exertion in dissuading me, leaving things to operate in his favour of their own accord, from the known violence of my father's character, and from my techiness; of both of which he had met with ample proofs.

My visit was short. My father charged me with completing his ruin. He expressed his contempt for the abject wretch who could so willingly become the tool of a swindling adventurer. My punishment, he said, was rapidly approaching. It would be the natural result of my blind credulity. "The scoundrel" added he "under whose influence you are acting, would have sold you before, and will still sell you, to the highest bidder."

He was proceeding to say something of Villiers having required five thousand pounds for his consent to the arrangements, but before he could make the story intelligible, his rage had become so ungovernable that it was useless for me to attempt to reason with him. I had remained silent during the whole of his harangue, which closed with his ordering me to quit his presence for ever.

My pride was roused. It had been my intention to have administered to his wants, and I could not help feeling myself unfairly treated. I left the house with a firm resolution of attending to the latter part of his request, to which I ever after adhered.

CHAP. VII.

TASTE.

ALTHOUGH I had never known a father's care nor a father's fondness, I could not help feeling much disturbed at thus parting in anger with the author of my being, whom I thought myself destined never to see again. However much all ties of blood may be ridiculed by those who maintain the superiority of mind over matter, or who regard the social affections as the offspring of habit and education, there is a certain feeling grateful to the heart in occasional intercourse with near relations. The ties of blood may be disregarded, but it is nevertheless consolatory to an individual to fancy that he is not "himself alone" in the world, but that there are others, let the motive be what it will, whether pride or something else, who take an interest in his welfare. Certain qualms of conscience occasionally told me, that I might have acted otherwise towards my father, and still preserved my reputation for "good sense and discernment." But I partook too largely of his disposition for obstinacy to make any advances towards a reconciliation. From him none could be expected. My intentions towards him, I was satisfied were good; and I reasoned with myself that I had done my duty as far as I was permitted:

The advice of Villiers might have been abstractly good in itself, but I could not in my heart acquit him of being the cause of this estrangement. My sus-pitions of him were somewhat roused, contrary to the declaration I had made to him that my confidence was, and would continue unshaken. There was a strong shade of probability in the charge my father had made against him, but as nothing further arose at that time to confirm my suspicions, and, as I was, in a manner, driven upon Villiers as the only person who could advise and direct me, they soon died away. I determined however to be upon my guard, and to be guided by my own impulse alone. How far I was enabled to adhere to my resolution will hereafter appear.

On my return to the hotel I found Villiers in waiting. He was by no means surprised at the result of the conference. It was what he said he anticipated, and I ought doubly to rejoice at my escape. My father's intemperate haste, he considered, had been my greatest friend in fixing my wavering resolution. Wavering, he called it, because my character was deficient in nothing but stability. The spirit was willing, but the flesh was weak. "You now," he continued, "know the Earl's disposition, and you must now be well aware of the weakness of the foundation upon which his conclusions are built. In his passion he is regardless of consequences, and woe be to him who thwarts his views or opposes his designs, or whom he chooses to consider as having been instrumental in the frustration of either. But you are now your own master in every sense of the word. Your father has released you from all further claims, and has spurned your proffered services. It is fit that you now assume your rank in society, and that your establishment in life should be proportioned to your fortune. Your father must have resources of which we are not aware, and although he does not permit you to think for him, he cannot deprive you of the liberty of both thinking and acting for yourself."

I had as great an inclination to use my fortune as my friend had to abuse it. The idea of a corresponding establishment was therefore embraced without hesitation, and means were immediately taken to convert idea into reality. We removed from my quarters of concealment to an hotel of the first importance, and employed our mornings in search of a house in which my grandeur could be displayed to advantage. After much labour in vain, the house of Lord Sniperhead, in Grosvenor Square, was offered to me as a tremendous bargain. His lordship had been just dished, and had declared his intention of ruralizing; the air of London having a bad effect upon his nerves. I took the opinion of an eminent upholsterer, who had furnished the house and who was of course the most competent judge of its value.

His Lordship was considerably in the upholsterer's debt, but that was a circumstance which, he took care to inform me, could not bias the opinion of a strictly honest man. Taking his advice, I subsequently received his congratulations on being the purchaser at the price of ten thousand guineas. My bargain, he told me, was worth a couple of thousand any day of the week, if I thought proper to part with it. Poor Lord Sniperhead was obliged to sell in a hurry. Could he have waited the regular market, it was impossible to say what price could not have been obtained. I was satisfied with my purchase, and as the upholsterer had been the means of my procuring it, I could not do otherwise than avail myself of his taste and assistance, in rendering the house fit for my reception.

While the upholsterer was carrying on his operations, and actually furnishing my house with new goods, which he managed to obtain by the simple process of an execution on the goods and chattles of the former owner, we fixed our abode in a suite of elegant apartments in Albemarle Street. My servants were summoned to town, and I began to assume the appearance of a man of rank and fashion. But in lodgings, it was utterly impossible to indulge in that luxury and splendour which I had contemplated ; I therefore pressed forward the labours of the upholsterer, thinking every day an age which intervened between the prospect and the possession. I remember observing once or twice to Mr. Drapery, the upholsterer, that some of the mahogany furniture did not look to be new, but he assured me he had taken the most particular pains in manufacturing my goods with wood that had been thoroughly seasoned by age. The fact was, that it had not only been seasoned by age but by wear. But Villiers told me that such petty considerations were below the notice of a nobleman.

Nothing is more easy to the favoured sons of fortune, than an introduction into the first circles. Wealth is a passport to every mixed assemblage, where its possessor is eagerly courted to enlarge the sphere of his acquaintance. To a single man, whether he be old or young, every facility is afforded. He meets with allurements in all directions, and may pick and cull where he pleases. Every bait is thrown out by match-making matrons to provide for their daughters or nieces ; nor are daughters and nieces in general less anxious to embrace an opportunity of escaping from bondage. My evenings were occupied in a continued round of company, but all attacks upon my heart were unsuccessful—my time was not yet come. I had, indeed, no leisure to fall in love ; and without leisure, I verily believe, that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, Cupid's arrows would be launched in vain.

The house was magnificently fitted up, and superbly decorated. The genius of Mr. Drapery was allowed full scope, and the grandeur of his ideas was exemplified in every thing—even in the amount of his bill. But I had the satisfaction of hearing on all sides, that Lord Winterbourne's house was a masterpiece of elegance and taste. This in itself was an ample compensation for a few extra thousands—at least so Villiers assured me; and as his opinion somewhat corresponded with my own, I did not entertain a doubt of its correctness. I spared no expence in my horses, carriages, or servants. My wine-cellar was filled with the choicest and most expensive wines; and the establishment of a bachelor, who had not completed his two and-twentieth year, might vie, in every respect, with that of the first family in the state. The bustle attendant on these arrangements completely occupied my mind for three months. But before I could open my house in a style suitable to its magnificence, the London season had elapsed, and the chief votaries of fashion had departed to the country to lay in a fresh stock of health and strength against the next winter's dissipation. The house-warming was therefore deferred to the following year.

On emerging from the obscurity in which I had buried myself on my first arrival in town, I removed my banking account from the city, which I disdained to have any thing to do with, to the house of Messrs. Diddle, Crack and Co. in Pall Mall. To save unnecessary trouble, I furnished those gentlemen with a power of attorney to sell out stock, desiring them to consider my fixed balance at ten thousand pounds, and to manage the account accordingly, without subjecting me or themselves to an unnecessary correspondence. However weak it may appear, I was for a time highly gratified with the power of drawing for immense sums, which I paid in again. I took as much pleasure in pulling about a heap of gold, as Potemkin did in handling his diamonds. But I soon grew tired. From this practice, however, sprung the first misfortune I ever experienced.

Soon after I made the purchase of my house, in riding through the Park, I was struck with the appearance of an elegantly-dressed female, who was walking with a matron-like woman, that might have passed for her mother. The form of the younger lady was graceful in the extreme, nor did her face do any discredit to her form. I had never, in my own opinion, behold so enchanting an object. It would be useless for me to enter into a minute description of her personal beauties; it is sufficient to state, that their effects upon me were irresistible. But however my thoughts were occupied, I cannot exactly vouch for the purity of my intentions.

Villiers, who, as usual, accompanied me, seeing my attention so rivetted, immediately offered his services in ascertaining the name and condition of the fair incognita; and with that view pretended to take his leave of me. He rode off in an opposite direction, with one of the grooms, but in a few minutes I saw him alight, and, at a distance, follow the ladies on foot.

I returned home in a state of impatience. I had seen an object to desire, but as to love it was out of the question. Had there been much family or consequence to boast of, I was aware that females so attired would have been attended with a protector, in the shape of a footman. I counted the hours as they struck, and looked every ten minutes at my watch; but night came and no appearance of Villiers. I sat up in the expectation of receiving intelligence, which would allay my fervor, until the clock announced the near approach of daylight. I then gave up all hopes of seeing him till the morning, and went to rest. Villiers was in the breakfast-room when I entered it. He gave me a long history of the difficulties he had experienced in the pursuit, but his perseverance had been at last rewarded by ascertaining, that the ladies resided in Edward Street, Cavendish Square. Their name he said was Henderson. The elder lady was the widow of a colonel in the army, and the younger was her only daughter. Their means were rather confined, but their respectability undoubted.

This intelligence gave me the highest satisfaction, and my gratitude to my friend, as far as words could go, was unbounded. Words answered every purpose to him, for my purse was already less mine than his own.

In the business I had now on hand, my companion was of the most essential service. To his other accomplishments I found him admirably qualified for the honourable office of a pimp. Nothing was farther from my thoughts in this indeed, than marriage. The negociation would be, for a wife in every respect but the ceremony. However splendidly the table of a bachelor might be set out, there was a something wanting to render it complete. A lovely female would grace the head of it, enliven it by her charms, as well as by supplying it with a fresh topic of conversation. For I had already found out that sprightliness in the rising generation required a constant supply of novelty to preserve it from dulness and insipidity. Besides, my phaeton and horses had been sufficiently seen and admired—my finery was grown stale. A beautiful woman by my side in my morning's drive, would again render me an object of notice, or rather an object of envy ; for a desire of being envied is, after all, the main spring upon which the fashionable world performs its functions. Like other idle fools who rail at matrimony, I was determined not to surrender my liberty. I had no aversion to entering upon a connection which should endure as long as I loved, but as yet, I had an insuperable objection to fetter myself with indissoluble chains as long as I lived.

Here Villiers was quite at home, and entered upon the negotiations without delay. It never entered my head at the time how much I was degrading myself, by associating with such a despicable character as that of a pander. But, at all events, I was not singular; for, from the observations I have since made, I believe there are few to be found among the nobility or gentry, who have not, at some period or other of their lives, disgraced themselves in a similar manner; and if such degradation can be at all palliated and excused, it is when the current of the blood flows rapidly, and not when age has tempered its impetuosity.

The proceedings, as I was led to suppose, were conducted with the utmost delicacy and caution. I was requested, as I hoped to attain the summit of my hopes, to avoid all personal interference. At length, after a few days of most intolerable suspense, which appeared to me to be so many ages, I was blessed with an interview with the charming Miss Henderson. This completed my captivity, and I verily think, that had my inexperience been kept in proper play, and had not the intentions of Villiers been otherwise directed, my determination might have failed me, and I might have been drawn in to convert the cast-off mistress of Sir Clarence Dupely into a future countess.

Villiers perceived that I was too far gone for his purposes. His reign would necessarily cease on my placing myself under an influence superior to his own. A mistress or a wife who was capable of obtaining an ascendancy over my mind, would have been equally fatal to his views. He therefore contrived to draw me away; and to prevent a further intercourse, informed me I had so betrayed the ardency of my attachment, that, without good management, the goods would cost more than they were worth. I restrained my impatience, and by his advice proposed settlements, and ventured to offer terms in a letter to the mother. It was indignantly returned, accompanied by an answer from the old lady, upbraiding me with the cruelty of my conduct towards "her dear Emma." They were not rich, she said, but they had hitherto been virtuous; and she trusted that her beloved Emma would ever be free from the wicked designs of that base deceiver—man. Heaven alone could help those who had only virtue for their portion. Her daughter, she trusted Providence, had been brought up in the practice of piety, apart from sin, and would do credit, she hoped, to her education, and her mother's example.

In the impulse of the moment, I should have offered to appease injured innocence by laying my hand and fortune at the dear Emma's feet; but Villiers checked me by saying:—

"Plague on these squeamish toads, one does not know how to catch them. If one out-bids the market price, it makes them saucy; and if one under-bids, they are directly virtuous and innocent. Send her a carte blanche, and then let us see the extent of her conscience."

The remainder of the negociation was conducted solely by Villiers. What actually passed, I know not; but we were all of us his dupes. He constantly kept us asunder, and amused me by tales of Miss Emma's scruples and delicacy.

Villiers said he offered the carte blanche, and narrowly escaped being kicked down stairs for his pains. The ladies, he added, had declared their intention of immediately placing themselves, where they would be free from a repetition of such insults. I sent him back to make all the amends in my power; but they had left their apartments in a hackney coach, of which no one had noticed the number, and no one could inform him where the coachman had been directed to drive. In the management of this business I proved the immense advantage of a deputy; had I gone to make the enquiries myself, I should have been satisfied that the virtuous Emma and her mamma, had adopted that prudent mode of retreat, not to clear themselves from solicitations on my part, but to avoid the trouble of discharging certain pecuniary obligations, which they had contracted in the neighbourhood, as well as to prevent the necessity of accounting for their being possessed of goods which certain tradesmen had declared to have lost.

But as I was not aware of these circumstances till I became accidentally acquainted with them, after my separation from Villiers, I acted under the first impulse. On his bringing me the intelligence, I gave way to my usual rage at being thus disappointed in the sanguine expectations I had formed. I know not to what a pitch my vehemence would have carried me, but my passion gradually subsided when Villiers reminded me of some inconsistencies in Miss Emma's manner which, I was obliged to confess, did not exactly correspond with the assumed rigidity of the mamma. He also hinted at the style of dress she had adopted. It had every thing about it, that was elegant and becoming. It was in the very height of the fashion, and exposed more charms than there was perhaps any real occasion for.

The wound was only skin deep, and was speedily healed. All recollection was soon dissipated by the fascinating charms of the dice box, to which Villiers now led me, with a view of weaning my attention from pursuits, which might endanger his own consequence. The sample which he had already witnessed of my devotion to female charms, was sufficient to convince him that a recurrence was far from desirable. But as the blank left in the mind by the cessation of one passion must be occupied by another, nothing was left but travelling or gaming. For the former I had no inclination as I was not yet tired of my own country. The latter was therefore chosen as I could enjoy it without giving up other pleasures which, as yet had not begun to cloy.

CHAP. VIII.HONOUR.

BY the introduction of the Earl of Cullymore, I now became a member of the fashionable clubs. At his Lordship's intercession Villiers was likewise admitted, although I was given to understand at the time, that the honour which was conferred upon my companion was entirely on my own account. My acquaintance with Lord Cullymore was of no very long standing ; he was a personage held in no very great esteem by the respectable part of the community, but as he was a cheerful addition to a bachelor's table, by a vast deal of ribaldry, which I then thought to be wit, he was always a welcome visitor, and in many points was likely to make a formidable rival to Villiers. His Lordship was equal to the latter in meanness, but his superior in the art of exciting attention. My companion was all servility, while the Earl cloaked his subserviency under the guise of friendship, which he professed to entertain for me in an unbounded manner. Indeed, he gave me frequent proofs of it, for he was frequently declaring that I was the only man upon earth from whom he had a regard sufficient to borrow money. His Lordship was unhappily experiencing considerable delays in the payment of his rents, which rendered the loan of a few hundreds for a few days a matter of some little convenience. This was repeated at intervals, but as I kept no accounts,

I have no idea of the actual extent of his Lordship's esteem for me.

In addition to his Lordship I had another member of his family upon my shoulders. The honourable and reverend Adolphus Cully was a regular attendant at my breakfast table. His remarks extended but a little way beyond eulogizing the noble conduct of "my brother Cullymore."

"He is a noble fellow, my Lord Winterborne. But his cursed Irish tenants keep him so behind hand with his rents that his liberal hands are tied;—I have always received a princely income from him;—his soul and every thing about him is noble;—I have just been presented to a glorious living, but poor fellow, his cursed Irish tenants keep him so behind hand that it is positively out of his power to advance me the first fruits."

"Pray, Sir, what is the amount?"

"A trifle!—Three hundred pounds!"

“Allow me to advance it to you. It must be a glorious living, indeed.”

“A noble living! but it is a horrible thing to borrow money. It lays one under such obligations. I cannot think of troubling you. I had rather lose the living.”

“Nay, I must insist upon it.”

“It is hard, very hard, to be deaf to the proffers of a noble friendship.”

“We will say no more, Mr. Cully. This draft will I hope answer your purpose.”

“You’ll take my acknowledgement?”

“Not the least occasion. Between friends, such ceremony is useless.”

“Very right——With men of honour——Good morning, my Lord!”

“You have not finished your breakfast, Mr. Cully!”

“The living! the living! my Lord!”

I did not see Mr. Cully again for several days. He had then unforunately lost the living, by being too late with the first fruits. But he had the promise of another, and should have his money ready that it might not slip through his fingers.

His next application to me was dated from Newgate, where he was confined for a debt of eight pounds. It was to request the loan of a guinea. I sent him ten by the hands of his brother, who expressed an intention one day of going to see him, but I since heard that the gold was stopped in transitu.

The employment of the gaming table was new to me, and my mind for a time could feel all the delightful sensations of hope and fear, joy and horror, suspense and certainty, at a low stake. It afforded me no small amusement to view the same countenance alternately sunk by disappointment and raised by exultation. To see the eagerness which every one showed, during the moment of doubt, and the varied passions which marked the result. Joy was counting its heaps in one corner of the room, while despair sat fixed and stupid at another. In a third corner I frequently perceived a miserable shrivelled old man, who I was told had realized an immense fortune by honour, without touching a card or a dice box. His practice was to lend money over night to be returned upon honour next morning with an enormous premium. It was in every sense of the word a debt of honour, and the borrower could not again shew his face till "Jew Jack" expressed himself satisfied.

My tutor had cautioned me against the tricks of gamesters, and the impression made upon my mind was not yet obliterated. I doubted my skill, and was careful of my purse. I had not as yet imbibed a sufficiently high opinion of my own infallibility, to imagine that I equalled in science, those who had devoted a life to the pursuit, and had attained the rank of veteran professors. It was in vain I was complimented upon my skill and judgment. I was proof to every thing but Villiers, and prided myself on the fortitude with which I resisted all the attacks which were levelled against me. I began to think that I was beyond the reach of deception. In all this I was applauded and encouraged by Villiers, who was unwilling that any one should share with him in my property without a valuable consideration. Villiers occasionally wished me to try my skill against particular persons. I sometimes won a little, and the next time lost a great deal. He was sometimes obliged to repress my ardour by warning me of my prudent resolutions, and sometimes he permitted it to burn out in the natural way.

That is, when I became too tired to proceed any farther.

As my title and fortune gained me an easy admittance into the first circles of fashion, the knowledge that my stock of ready money was by no means confined, made me a welcome visitor in the highest society the country afforded, and as Villiers was my constant companion, without whom I never stirred an inch, he was admitted likewise. My caution for a long time protected me from every incitement; but one unlucky evening, after a copious libation at ——— house where I was received for especial reasons upon a footing of familiar intimacy, the dice box was introduced, merely with a view of beguiling the time, until the hour of supper. We played for such trifles as were incapable of rousing my mind from the stupifying effects of the liquor I had drank. I felt myself drowsy, and I imagine that my drowsiness ended in sleep, for the transactions which followed left no traces in my memory. On the following morning I tried to recollect with distinctness what had passed; but it was impracticable. I had an idea that all was not right, and a confused notion that I had signed a draft on my bankers, but beyond that my powers of reminiscence wholly failed me.

I slept longer than usual, and on awaking, found Villiers by my side. He mentioned to me the extreme difficulty he had, in restraining me from ruining myself. I had been seized, he said, with an incomprehensible fervor, and might consider myself fortunate that he had at last succeeded in conveying me away, after I had signed a draft for Seventy Thousand Pounds.

“Seventy Thousand Pounds,” exclaimed I, “impossible !”

“It is but too true.”

“ Fly instantly to the bankers and stop the payment of the draft ! ”

“ Remember where you passed the evening . ”

“ No matter ! I have still been swindled—fly ! you may yet be in time !

He went out—I hurried on my clothes, and in a state little short of absolute distraction, I hastened after him. But although terror at the loss which I either had or was about to sustain, had lent wings to increase my speed, I arrived at the banking house too late ; the bearer of the draft having received the amount of it only five minutes previous to my arrival. Villiers had had the start of me, but he did not reach the banking-house until I had been there some seconds ; but I attributed this delay to my superior haste. He had not the same motives for dispatch, which actuated me ; and judging of his feelings by my own, I supposed he dreaded that my loss was past recovery.

I desired to see the draft. It was put into my hands. The signature was unquestionably mine, but the remainder of the writing was of a character to which I was a total stranger.

Villiers declared it to be the writing of the Honourable Robert Carlingford, who had formed one of the party on the preceding evening.

I enquired if it was usual to pay drafts of such a large amount, without receiving a previous notice.

They acknowledged that they had hesitated for a time, but as it was presented for payment by a person whom they knew to be of undoubted respectability, they paid it without scruple; particularly as my instructions were, they told me, of that positive nature, which did not leave them the power of dishonouring a draft, be the amount what it would, so long as they had within themselves sufficient assets to meet it.

My loss was now past redemption. My denial of having played to that amount was of no avail. Villiers pleaded, that in proportion, he was no better off than myself, having lost all the cash that he could justly consider his own. I reasoned with myself, that had there been any unfair dealings, Villiers was as likely to be a victim as I was; and as I could not suppose that personages of such distinguished rank would enter into a collusion with a man in his situation, I acquitted him of all blame in the transaction. Swindled I certainly was, and nothing could obliterate the impression from my mind. The party consisted of only four, besides Villiers and myself. I separately applied to each, and each confirmed the truth of the statement.

Submission to my lot was all that was left me. Redress was vain. To have doubted the honour of any of the party would have been worse than sacrilege, for the doubt must have extended to the whole. I know not how in honour I could have resisted the payment of the draft. It was a debt of honour to all intents and purposes, although nothing will ever make me alter the opinion I then entertained of the business.

By the evening, as I had not recovered that tone of mind which would enable me to appear in company with my customary nonchalance, I strolled to the theatre. The play was the “Beggar’s Opera,” and I chanced to enter the house as Macheath was singing:—

“ Since laws were made for every degree
“ To curb vice in others as well as in me,
“ I wonder we have not better company,
“ Upon Tyburn Tree.”

I turned round significantly to Villiers.—He comprehended my meaning, shrugged up his shoulders, and turned pale. What the last was for, I could not tell, but I placed the turning pale to inward rage at the treatment I had experienced.

However, I solemnly foreswore gaming, notwithstanding Villiers argued the rashness, not to say wickedness of resorting to oaths on petty occasions, and I have never since swerved from my resolution. In the end, I have, perhaps, been a gainer; for had it not been for some very striking occurrence, I might have lost more in smaller amounts than I was——of, in a large one; and at the same time might have acquired an irresistible attachment to the dice box.

CHAP. IX.REFLECTION.

THE severe lesson I had just met with, threw me into a serious train of reflection. Hitherto pleasure had been my business; it was my sole occupation, and it was the chief study of the day, when I was not actually employed in a pursuit which afforded gratification, to lay plans for consuming the morrow. For the future I had no thought. My hand at the bottom of a draft placed nothing beyond my reach which money could purchase; and what is there, save honour, virtue, and happiness, which gold cannot procure. Of honour, in the common acceptation of the word, I was heartily sick. If it had any meaning at all, it was one disgraceful to the user. As to its real import I was still ignorant. I had defrauded no one by falshood and misrepresentation ; I had debauched no man's wife ; and I was free from murder sanctified with the appellation of an affair of honour.

He that is unacquainted with the horrors of remorse, the stings of vice, and the pangs of misery, is apt to consider himself in the possession of both virtue and happiness, and to regard the fine-spun theories of our ethical writers upon those subjects, as chimeras which originate in fancy, and which are dissipated by observations on real life. To the patient who is labouring under acute bodily sufferings, the absence of pain is a cause of pleasure ; and to the individual whose amusements are alone derived from external objects, the absence of pleasure is the cause of pain. The man whose conscience is not so loaded with criminality as to become oppressive, will be sure to look upon himself as possessed of virtue, while a closer insight into his own breast will lay open to him a host of imperfections.

Dissatisfaction with myself was the consequence of reflection. I had consumed weeks and months in thoughtless dissipation, and could recal no single image upon which my mind could dwell with satisfaction. The past was a perfect blank. I had rushed impetuously into the stream of folly. I had suffered myself to be carried away by the current, and when by the expanding banks and regular bottom its force became less rapid, at least, by the cessation of novelty, less rapid in imagination, I discovered that the vapidness of the future left before me nothing to desire—nothing to enjoy.

For the first time in my life I ventured to encroach so far upon my amusements as to look into the state of my affairs. The sum total of my present personal property was put into my hands by Mr. Crack, the Banker, and to my astonishment I found, that with the purchase of my house, the cost of my stud of horses, the expence of my living, and my recent heavy loss, with a variety of et cæteras, too numerous to mention, including loans to such of my particular friends as, like my Lord Cullymore, did me the honour of referring their wants to my supposed inexhaustible purse, my funded property and ready money had dwindled down to less than forty thousand pounds. Out of this comparative pittance, I had to pay no small sum to my coachmaker; a very large one to my wine-merchant; an equal if not a larger amount to my upholsterer: besides my tailor, harness-maker, &c. &c.

which my dignity did not permit to be disproportioned to the other part of my expenditure.

How this enormous sum was wasted away, I can form no sort of idea. I found that there was my own draft for every item. I examined the checks again and again, but could neither discover an error in them, nor in the banker's accounts. It is true I seldom looked at any draft I signed; they were prepared by Villiers for such sums as he thought necessary. His usual way was to produce his book of accounts for examination, saying that every thing which passed through his hands was regularly minuted, and expressing a desire that I would acknowledge their correctness as we went on. This I generally did by signing the book and the check at the same time, without looking at either, beyond the space occupied by my hand-writing. The result of all my enquiries amounted simply to this,

that the residue of my cash and funded property would not do much more than satisfy the outstanding demands against me.

Thus within less than six months I had squandered, for I cannot say spent, little short of two hundred thousand pounds. My mind is still bewildered with the recollection. The wise Commons of England were certainly justified in their conclusion that ten hundred thousand pounds sounded considerably more than a million, labouring as they did under the apprehension that what was expressed in so short a term as a million would be as shortly regarded by the sovereign to whom it was granted. Thousands and tens of thousands had been so familiarized to my imagination that they excited less interest than a pound does with me at the present moment.

Until the fatal night at —— house, my losses at play had been trivial, too trivial at least to form a leading feature in the general amount, and perhaps not beyond what I should have expended in other amusements. I had been balked in my endeavours to waste much on a woman, and had not therefore to provide an extravagant mistress with black boys and silver tea kettles, diamond necklaces and pink noyau, lace veils and ortalons. With the mere expences of eating and drinking few fortunes are injured ; the scattering of my property, therefore, still remained a perfect enigma.

At all events retrenchment was indispensable. My fortune could no longer support the style of living I had adopted. I suspected unfair treatment somewhere. The amount of my friend's gains the reader may perhaps estimate, for as to myself I am both loth and unable to attempt it.

The high opinion I had hitherto entertained of the integrity of Villiers was shaken but not destroyed. He did not appear to justify my former opinion of his steadiness, and I could call to mind some sneering expressions which had been made use of in his presence, which he had suffered to pass unnoticed. They were of such a nature as a man of honour would not have disregarded, and I was reluctantly obliged to confess that my bosom friend and companion was not a man of modern honour; in plain English that he wanted courage to be shot at. Such is the bad habit of early associations, that I had some how inseparably combined the ideas of honour and honesty, and I had not exactly separated real honour from modern honour. The consequence was natural, and such as might be expected from an inexperienced reasoner; I concluded my friend to be deficient in both. But as I could neither directly nor indirectly bring any point home to him, without exposing myself, I made the best of my situation.

I was now, however, in reality, careful and suspicious, but in cases like mine these are synonymous terms.

The reflection that I had squandered away an immense sum, which would have been in great measure, the means of preserving my father's honour, and of course the honour of my family, discomposed me not a little. But as it was totally foreign to my nature to make concessions, to court regard, or to own myself mistaken, my father never had the satisfaction of knowing how much my inclinations led towards a reconciliation with him. This however is an acknowledgment, by the bye, and given at a time when I have no one to rejoice at my abandoning an error, or to reproach me with persevering in a hasty impression. A reconciliation however, would have been of little service to my father at that time, for I had no longer the means of assisting him, and I was firmly resolved not to dismember the Erpingham estates.' But as I was thoroughly sick of myself and of every thing about me, I verily believe that had the intervention of some kind friend brought us once more together, such an event might have given a total change to my character, and saved me from numberless miseries hereafter.

To avoid sinking under a depression of spirits which I found fast growing upon me, I tried the effects of a change of scene, and following the usual routine of fashion, I devoted the hot summer months to an excursion along the southern coast, having in the first instance, previous to my leaving London, discharged all the domestics that were superfluous in the style of living which I intended to adopt. Villiers as usual accompanied me, but it was evident to both that the tie which had held us was considerably weakened, and that it wanted but a little to destroy it entirely. Had my real inclination been known to

Giles I doubt not I should have been spared much subsequent uneasiness. But the poor fellow had been so often witness to my blind infatuation, and had moreover seen the excessive tyranny which Villiers exerted towards the servants, discharging with ignominy such as he had the slightest reason to suspect inimical to his interest, that he had given me up as a lost man. He had formerly made some attempts to induce me to look with my own eyes, but the reception his suggestions invariably met with, were such, that I wonder he ever had the courage to repeat them.

Some writer has compared the eyes of menial dependants to those of a lynx, and says, that they are the first to discover a decline in the favourite's influence. He may be right: but as there is allowed to be no general rule without an exception, not even, as Sterne observes, in a man being present in the shaving his own beard, I certainly found an exception in this instance, and this is not the only case in which I have found my mind and body actuated by feelings and impressions different from the bulk of mankind. I was too proud to let it be seen that I associated with a person whom I either disliked or suspected. In the presence, therefore, of others, a common observer could not have perceived any sensible alteration; on the contrary he might have considered, from an extra portion of civility and attention, that the power of the favourite had not yet reached its zenith, but was still upon the advance. It was sufficient that our shyness and reserve in private was convincing to ourselves that my state of pupillage was at an end.

I cannot accuse myself of an affectation of singularity, nor of actually possessing that qualification. Hundreds aim at it with the utmost eagerness, but

I could never discover any charm in being different from the rest of mankind, and I always thought it an infallible proof of an empty inside when all the wit was confined to the outside. On a review of my life, however, there is one point in which I sincerely trust that I stand alone: I never appear to have acted in any one instance from a principle of conscious rectitude, nor has any one act of my own, from the day of my birth to the present time, tended to my advantage either in the improvement or the satisfaction of my mind.

Villiers adroitly kept up the appearance of his influence, in which he was no less assisted by what I have just observed, than by my natural indolence. I still submitted to be the passive tool of my companion, inwardly hoping that some happy incident or other would release me from my thralldom.

In this manner several weeks elapsed in hurrying from place to place; and but for the recollection of my extravagance and recent losses, I might be said to have experienced in an intolerable degree "the wants of him that wants nothing."

CHAP. X.THE RENT DAY.

AS it is not my intention that “Some Account of Myself,” should rival an Itinerary, and contain “some account of the watering places which I visited in the course of my tour, I shall only observe of them, that they are so many places of dissipation, where the vices and follies of the metropolis are practised on a minor scale, in the regions of peace and quietness. It would I know, have made a much better close to the sentence if I had said innocence and tranquillity, but unfortunately as far as my observations have extended, country innocence is pretty much upon a par with country ignorance, and country tranquillity with the want of opportunity to make a noise. In London, sins may be committed with comparative impunity, and are easily compounded for by faith or election, both of which are, by the bye, comfortable doctrines to determined backsliders; but in the country there is a necessity for comparative goodness, as far as outward appearance goes, if a person is at all desirous of the countenance of his neighbours. If he is not virtuous he must seem so, and that with the majority of mankind will answer every purpose.

In this way, however, I passed the time until the fashionable commencement, not the real commencement, of the sporting season, when custom has prescribed a residence at the country mansion to those who have one, and a life of obscurity to such as are not so provided. In the true spirit of contradiction, when Nature is about to strip the country of her brightest ornaments, imperious fashion dispatches her votaries there, to consume the vacant interval until her reign again commences in the now deserted capital. I reluctantly followed the usual routine, and made my way towards Bingwood; not that I should have been in want of company had I chosen to accept a tenth part of the invitations which were made to me on both sides of the question. That is, on one side, those who invited me to their houses, and on the other side, those who kindly invited themselves to mine. The Honourable Gregory Gosling attacked me with a double edged sword; for tired of pressing me to Gander Hall, he insisted that we should spend the autumn together, and if I would not accompany him he would accompany me. I got out of this scrape by telling him in confidence that I was going into the country for the express purpose of studying the statutes at large and the parliamentary history, preparatory to my occupying an ostensible post he might guess where. This had the desired effect, and Gosling was contented with expressing his heartfelt sorrow that I was about to enter the field of ambition.

∴ The fact was, I was out of humour with myself. I had particular views to be accomplished, and did not wish that my actions should be witnessed, or that I should be exposed to the necessity of providing entertainment for others, when I stood so much in need of it myself. I certainly looked forward to a residence at Bingwood with a feeling almost amounting to abhorrence, but I was determined not to be diverted from my intention. Possibly a part of the dislike I felt was occasioned by my having passed only one season in the busy world, and although a good deal disgusted, not yet completely sickened with its gaieties, and allurements. It is, however, certain, that Ovid could not have deplored his exile more bitterly than I did my voluntary banishment. Not that I regretted the loss of society, for I entered into none that excited the slightest degree of interest in my breast. I had moreover paid very severely for my introduction to the first circles. But in London there is that constant succession of novelty, which cannot fail of being pleasing to a youthful mind. There is such complete occupation for a head but slenderly provided with the materials for thinking. To crown the whole, there is an independence of thought and action to be obtained there, which no other part of the kingdom can bestow. Every man, there, appears too much occupied with his own concerns to regard those of his neighbour. The sensible man will meet with a companion, and the fool will meet with brethren to keep him in countenance. The vicious may revel in secret, and the unostentatiously virtuous have ample scope for the indulgence of amiable propensities.

My sensations on my arrival at Bingwood were such as I had anticipated. My youth had never been remarkable for cheerfulness, and the strong contrast between my last leaving it, in the full possession of my property, and my present arrival after squandering so large a portion, strongly affected me.

My intercourse with Villiers was now fast drawing towards a conclusion. Although I felt that I could not much longer keep my dislike a secret, I continued at first to behave as usual, fearing to lessen myself in the estimation of my tenants if I acted in such a way as would reflect on the character of the man I had so highly praised.

In the openness of my heart and in the fullness of my joy, I had promised the tenants, that they should always have half a year's rent in arrear. The ensuing rent day, then, was the first in which Villiers was to officiate in his promised office of steward. I had resolved within myself, that it should be the last.

My income was still a noble one, and was unincumbered. My personal property was still amply sufficient to answer every demand against me. Time, therefore, would have reconciled me to my losses, and it is possible that had not fresh vexations awaited me, I might even have become an optimist, and have believed that the early visitation I had experienced, was meant to call me to a sense of prudence.

A short time previous to the rent day, while Villiers was preparing for his new occupation, I took a morning's ride, attended only by Giles. I had no sooner left the verge of the park than my attendant rode up to my side, and requesting my pardon, put three letters into my hand. He then prepared to leave me. On looking at the direction I found that they were addressed to Villiers.

I desired to know why he had taken the liberty of prying into Mr. Villiers' concerns, and angrily commanded him to replace the letters where he had found them.

I had been in the habit of delivering my orders in a manner so peremptory, as admitted of no reply. Giles tremblingly took them, but I heard him mutter to himself that he hoped I should find out the rascal yet.

For the present I was contentedly the dupe of Villiers, but I could not bear the idea of being a laughing stock to my servants. Haughty and overbearing as I was in general, I had treated Giles in a way more approaching to familiarity than the other servants. I had formerly, when a child, treated him as my equal; and I always remembered that we had sucked from the same breast. After a conflict between pride and curiosity, I found the latter predominate. Calling to Giles, I requested to know how these letters had come into his possession, and why he had put them into my hand.

He told me that the Game-keeper had observed Peters several times lurking about Thrift Wood, and that very early one morning he himself had followed Villiers to the same place, where Peters was in waiting for him. He could not, he said, get near enough to hear the conversation, but by the gestures of Peters he appeared to be threatening the other. The letters which he gave me, he had picked up in Villiers' bed chamber, and having a great personal dislike to him, as well as believing him to be a great rascal, he had been tempted to read the contents, which he thought of too much importance to be concealed from me.

Thus circumstanced, I thought myself justified in infringing the rules of confidence. The letters were as follows :—

“ MR. VILLIERS,

“ You have not fulfilled your promise. I don’t like to threaten, but by the living G—d, if every thing is not directly settled, I’ll blow all.

W. PETERS.”

“ I shall be at Thrift Wood at four.”

The second was apparently from a town accomplice.

DEAR V.

“ M—— is beginning to squeak about the —— house job. They have used him no better than they did you—Make the best of your time—If you can finger the rents do—You can make your way to the old place.

T. ——.”

The third was from my Coach-maker.

“ Dear Sir,

“ We inclose you a draft for a thousand pounds, at two months after date, payable to your order. We have in this instance complied with your desire, relying upon your promise of procuring an early settlement of our account. This we are the more anxious for, as we understand Lord W. has undergone a complete sweating, and that money is getting low. We beg to say, that on any subsequent order we cannot afford so large a commission as thirty per cent, unless we can feel thoroughly assured of a speedy payment.

We are, Dear Sir,

Your obliged humble Servants,

T. and G. PERCHPOLE.”

These letters left no further room for conjecture, I had no time to lose. Detection, with these proofs would be easy, but I still wished to avoid the appearance of having been so miserably duped. Giles knew the contents of the letters: reserve towards him was therefore unnecessary. I confided to him, the line of conduct I intended to adopt in getting rid of the scorpion I had fostered, and desired him, when the rent day arrived, on no consideration to quit Villiers for an instant. If he appeared in the least inclined to decamp to detain him forcibly, trusting to me to take care of the consequences. I intended myself to take care of the money at the close of the day. In this way I felt perfectly secure.

On our return we found Villiers making enquiries among 'the servants for some letters which he imagined he had dropped somewhere about the house, but none could give him any satisfactory intelligence. His state of uneasiness was visible to every one. As Giles entered he renewed his enquiries. The bungling manner in which

Giles, who was a thoroughbred advocate for truth in serious matters, denied having any knowledge of them, tended to create a suspicion in the mind of the questioner that concealment was no longer possible. I restrained my feelings, and in endeavouring to hide them, even paid the rascal a double degree of attention. Probably he discovered what was passing within me, by my overplaying my part, for he was too well acquainted with my temper to be deceived.

The rent day arrived—my tenants were all of them punctual. Indeed the indulgence they had received would have rendered a non-attendance inexcusable. Giles stuck to his post with indefatigable attention, and I dare say during the whole of the operation never took his eyes from the Steward's motions. I went into the room two or three times, under pretence of showing myself to the farmers, and was satisfied that Villiers was sensible of his being closely watched, but there was no symptom of discomposure.

At the close of the day, I took my seat at the table, to the evident astonishment of my steward. I therefore imagined I had completely frustrated any plans he might have formed. But I was mistaken. The proverb of "Set a thief to catch a thief," is correct to the spirit and to the letter. I could only contemplate straight forward proceedings, and was wholly ignorant of the subterfuges of villainy. A police officer, judging from himself and his former practices, might have detected his brother rogue, but I defy any man who has held Hockley in the Hole and its practices in abhorrence, to have guarded against the deception which duped me in spite of my care and circumspection.

"My Lord," said the steward, at the conclusion of the business, with a countenance of the utmost coolness,

“ your lordship will here find the full amount of your half yearly rents. I have been hurried, but probably you will have the kindness to assist me in counting the money.”——

Unlike my former self, and as I foolishly imagined to the annoyance of Villiers, I reckoned up the whole amount. Every thing was correct. The money was laid before me, and I applauded myself for my prudence and penetration. I could now seize the first pretext for getting rid of Villiers, and time was allowed me to invent excuses for his dismissal. To avoid the charge of irritability, I determined to lay the separation upon him, and to say that he left me to advance himself. Once away from me, he immediately became an indifferent person, in whom I could not be expected to take any particular interest. If he chose to assume the character of a gentleman, I knew the sums he had obtained from me would enable him to do so, and for my own sake, I should keep his secret, as there was nothing I dreaded more than an exposure of my folly and weak infatuation.

“The notes, my Lord,” observed Villiers, “I perceive are almost entirely provincial, I should therefore recommend your lordship to forward them without loss of time to your London bankers, lest on any of them proving fictitious you make yourself answerable. The gold had better be sent likewise. If your Lordship will allow me I will fold them up and direct them to Mess. Diddle, Crack, and Co. They will be aware what is necessary to be done. You may dispatch the parcel to town as you think proper, but I think the sooner the better.”

The advice was too good to be rejected. Paper, string, and wax were brought,—I saw the parcel properly folded, directed, tied and sealed,—every thing was as I could have wished it.

“And now, my Lord,” said Villiers, “it is necessary for me to vindicate my own character; which it is too evident, although I am ignorant of the cause, has suffered materially in your estimation. But what I have to say is for your own ear. There is now no occasion for a witness.”

I desired that the room might be cleared. Giles, in pursuance of his directions, seemed inclined to remain in his post. He appeared as if he wished to speak with me. I rose from my seat, and angrily desired him to withdraw. The better to shew my confidence, I went to the door as if to see that there were no listeners.

On my return to the table I desired him to proceed, at the same time putting the parcel in my coat pocket.

“My Lord Winterbourne, I can no longer be blind to the opinion you have very unjustly formed of me. I assume that as a fact, as it will be the means of saving unnecessary words. I have hitherto discharged a pleasing duty. That duty now ceases—from this moment I consider myself as released from all further cares on your account. You will in time discover how much you have been mistaken in the man before you. Your behaviour for some time has ceased to be equivocal, but for the sake of consistency I restrained my own feelings, and fulfilled the duties I undertook from the purest motives, at our first acquaintance. To-morrow, my Lord, will see us perfect strangers. Your welfare will always be dear to me. But you, my Lord, would be degraded in associating with the man you suspected. On the other hand, I should degrade myself in my own estimation if I continued to receive favours from that person who no longer considered me worthy of his confidence.”

Here he paused. Our evening was passed under mutual restraint, and was terminated as soon as our usual custom would permit. We both seemed heartily tired of each other, and gladly separated. With me, self approbation acted as a narcotic potion. I was quietly rid of an irksome companion, and fell asleep in the act of building castles in the air for my future habitation.

CHAP. XI.THE SPUNGING HOUSE.

HAPPY in the thought of being again in the possession of personal independence, my waking dreams were delightful. The world was now before me, I could choose my company, and when weary I could return to privacy, or resort to others with whom I could again feel an interest. If I were desirous of making the horrors of my late situation comprehensible, it would be quite sufficient to refer the inquisitive reader to such of his acquaintance as have saddled themselves with a companion, on whom they have become dependent. Contracted indeed must be the circle in which a person moves, who has not an opportunity of witnessing the evil I have pointed out. I hailed my newly acquired liberty with heartfelt satisfaction, and in ruminating on the blessings before me, I indulged myself on my downy couch rather later than usual. I dressed myself deliberately and prepared to meet my friend for the last time. Before I left my dressing room I inquired for Mr. Villiers. My gentleman returned in a few minutes with the information that the bed in which Mr. Villiers usually slept, had been the preceding night unoccupied, and that the window which was but a short distance from the ground was wide open.

I mechanically felt in my coat pocket for the packet and found it perfectly safe. Astonished at this extraordinary circumstance I endeavoured to get some further explanation, and for that purpose sent the servants in all directions. In this I was completely unsuccessful. The door of the principal stable was locked, and the groom no where to be found. But this I did not consider as remarkable, as being careful of my horses I had desired him, when he took any of them out to exercise to lock the door, that no mischief might happen in his absence.

I can hardly recollect what my inducement was, but I was tempted to open the packet of money before I sent it to the coach. My consternation may be more easily conceived than described, when I discovered, that instead of the parcel in which I had seen the notes and gold safely deposited, I held in my hand one of an appearance exactly similar on the outside, but containing but a pair of my own old shoes with the heels cut off, and a large piece of lead.

My rage knew no bounds. To have revenged myself of the scoundrel who had thus put the finishing stroke to his villainy, I could have almost waded through a sea of blood. To be again duped in defiance of all my care, and in the face of all my suspicion—when I could not imagine the possibility even of being defrauded, was now more than I could well bear. But my rage was impotent; the rascal had placed himself out of the reach of my vengeance. If I endeavoured to follow him, and chanced to take the right road, he had at least ten hours the start of me; and I could easily fancy the rapidity with which guilt would fly. To overtake him was very improbable—his measures were evidently too well connected. His stay in England was not very likely; and he might as easily have reached Hull or Liverpool.

as London. However, as the country would have now become worse than purgatory, I resolved to proceed to London with all possible expedition, in the hope, though with little expectation, of seizing and crushing the serpent who had stung me.

My journey was performed with incredible celerity, and I had the satisfaction, about midway between Bingwood and London, to meet with certain traces, which marked the route the fugitive had taken ; for I painfully discovered two of my favourite horses completely knocked up. Their riders, which by the description were unquestionably Villiers and Peters, had passed on in a post-chaise only six hours previous to the coming up of myself and Giles, whom I had again made the companion of my journey.

It would have been utterly impossible for them to have reached town during the hours of business ; I did not, therefore, despair of ultimately succeeding in the chase. I could account for their being so much behind hand in their progress, either by the necessity they were under of resting the poor beasts by the way, or probably to avoid pursuit, they had taken a circuitous route. They must have travelled nearly seventy miles on the same horses, whereas Giles and myself had only ridden the first stage, and travelled the remainder in a postchaise and four. We were now, however, journeying upon a par in point of expedition, and I did not doubt that their exertions to avoid pursuit would be equal to ours to overtake them.

On my arrival in London, about eight o'clock in the morning, I lost no time in making the necessary depositions, and giving the proper descriptions at the mansion-house, and at the different police offices. I sent notice of the circumstances to the different banking-houses, desiring them to stop any great quantity of the notes of some particular country banks, in case they were presented for payment under suspicious appearances. With all this trouble and vexation, I neglected the most important point ; for I failed to make friends of the police officers in a proper manner. It is no wonder then, upon consideration, that I failed.

In the midst of our search I was suddenly seized by a couple of ruffian-looking men, who told me that I was their prisoner. It was in vain I endeavoured to convince them that they must have mistaken me for some other person—they seemed familiar with my name, and I could not certainly deny myself to be Viscount Winterbourne. They told me that they held a writ against me for no less a sum than ten thousand pounds. Satisfied that I owed nothing which I could not instantly command, and never having before seen any of these harpies, I said I would go with them to my bankers, and that they should have every security they desired ; but that it was highly important I should not be interrupted at present. Their duty they said was imperative, and their responsibility heavy. They could not tell who was who ; a lord had slipped through their fingers last week, and had saddled them with a debt of thirteen pounds ten shillings and fourpence. They had lost so much, by taking peoples' word, that they had forsworn trusting to anybody again. They had a great respect for me, and had no doubt every thing was right ; but I must really excuse them if they insisted upon my accompanying them to some place of confinement.

Giles was preparing to decide the dispute according to the laws of pugilistic warfare. In the heat of the moment I might have seconded him, but on a sudden I found myself dragged into a narrow passage, and forced within a strong grated door, which now separated me from my servant. I stormed, raved, and worked myself to a pitch of downright madness. In the heat of my phrenzy, I was almost incapable of articulating, much less of giving any rational directions, as to the steps to be taken for my release. Giles, who would have passed through fire and water to serve his master, was nearly in the same state. He kicked at the door, broke the windows, roared murder, and collected a crowd, which the bailiff harangued from the first floor, assuring them that what had been done was in the regular way of business. Giles, indeed, poor fellow, would have been equally at a loss had he retained the full possession of all his faculties, for he was ignorant of the names of my bankers, and of my former trustees, and these were the only persons to whom I could have applied at such an unhappy juncture.

Giles seeing that he could accomplish nothing for his master by force or violence, tried the art of persuasion, and by dint of begging, and the proof of quietness of disposition, prevailed on the people of the house to admit him. He tried every means in his power to pacify me; but the day was completely gone before I was sufficiently master of myself to send Giles to the banking-house of Messrs. Diddle, Crack and Co. He returned with the intelligence that the shop was closed;—that Mr. Diddle was on a shooting party in Norfolk;—Mr. Crack with the Leicestershire hunt; and of the remaining partners, one was gone to his country-house, and the other to one of the theatres, they could not say which. I then sent him to the trustees—the banker had been dead two days, and was now laying a corpse in the house; and Mr. Bearblock would not be in town till the following morning, having been sent for in a hurry to make Lord Scrape's will.

In this miserable dilemma, I joined Diddle, Crack and Co. Bearblock and Lord Scrape, in one general anathema. Nothing could be done, and I was doomed to pass the night in this dreadful state of horror and uneasiness. The keeper of the house had listened attentively to Giles's account of the transaction ; and as Giles knew my circumstances sufficiently to be certain that I could not really be in debt to any one, affected to suspect foul play, or at least professed to think that every thing was not as it should be. As it was his wish, he said, to oblige every body, and to promote the ends of justice, he recommended and offered to procure the advice and assistance of one of the greatest geniuses in the profession ; which term, I afterwards understood to mean, the greatest rogue. The drowning man catches at a straw ; I therefore readily consented to consult with this real genius.

A few minutes brought before my eyes this redoubtable champion of the law, in the person of a man whose height did not certainly exceed four feet ten inches. The sun, at an angle of forty-five degrees, would have made but little difference in his shadow, whether he stood upon his legs or lay upon his back. A bloated red face was illuminated by two small grey eyes, which refused to act in concert with each other, and which were fixed rather above a something difficult to be described, that nature had placed in the centre of his face, between a low forehead spotted with carbuncles, and a wide mouth deprived of all its ivory ornaments. The protuberance, which served the purposes of a nose to snuffle and sneeze through, if it was like any thing, appeared most nearly to resemble a piece of raw liver, shaped like a bruised potatoe.

This respectable-looking member of the legal profession was ushered into the room with the following elegant eulogium from the mouth of Mr. Holdfast, the keeper of the house.

“Charley’s the boy, my Lord, and if so be as how you have been cribbed out of the regular vay, he’ll make ’em all sweat for’t, d—n me if he von’t.”

Mr. Holdfast closed this piece of eloquence by a slap on Charley’s shoulder, which rather disturbed the lawyer’s balance. The latter, I suppose, not approving of such familiarity in the presence of a lordly client, frowned upon his conductor, and addressed his discourse to me with—

“Pray, my Lord, at whose suit have you been arrested?”

“That, Sir, I have yet to learn.”

“Aye, aye,” said the bailiff, “not unlikely! I have known many get into limbo without being able to tell who put them there. But you can give us a little bit of a guess, mayhap, as to which of your creditors have nabbed you."

"Which of my creditors, Sir? I have no creditors."

"Do you owe nothing then?" asked the lawyer.

"Nothing but what could have been discharged long before this, had I been possessed of the liberty of so doing."

"D—d uncivil though, to a Lord," observed the bailiff. "Such rogues, my Lord, ought to cross the vater, and replenish the plantations."

"Holdfast!" cried the lawyer, "bring the copy of the writ."

Mr. Holdfast went down stairs for his authority for the detention; and during his absence, Charley, for at that time I knew the lawyer by no other name, made several remarks upon the rascality of attornies in general, and congratulated me on falling into the hands of an honest man.

The copy of the writ was produced, and I found myself in custody at the suit of one Charles Villiers, for a debt of ten thousand pounds and upwards! My rage, and with it my phrenzy, returned in full force.

“ This,” I exclaimed, “ is our boasted land of liberty. And yet any scoundrel can imprison another whom he is swindling, with the dread of no other punishments than attends the usual consequences of perjury. He may defeat his pursuer at the moment he is about to be rendered up to justice; and thus, with impunity, gain time to escape, and carry off the fruits of his crimes.”

There was no need of further explanation. I had been defeated on every point, and nothing but personal liberty could be of use to me. I told the bailiff of the rascality of the transaction—explained to him how I had been treated—appealed to his feelings—threw myself upon his liberality—called upon Charley to plead my cause; and, in short, tried every figure of rhetoric in every possible way. I wished him to let one of his men attend me, declaring, on my honour, that I would not attempt to escape; and that I would certainly return. But my words were only like the gentle zephyrs, which fan the foliage without disturbing a leaf. Mr. Holdfast was proof against entreaty, and deaf to persuasion. The sum, he said, would ruin him. His letting me out might make him liable to an escape. His feelings were much hurt at refusing me, and he should be happy to serve me in what laid in his power. If I had any one to arrest, or the like of that, I should know what he was.

Charley, with a grin, observed that I knew what he was already. Mr.

Holdfast smiled at his friend's jest, but declared that he could on no account consent to my leaving his house, for any place but Newgate or the Bench, without having a sufficient security. . It was a hard case, he allowed, but he must attend to his wife and family, and could run no risks. . If I only saw Mrs. Holdfast and his little babes, who were now at his villa at Kentish Town, I should not wonder at his being so careful for their sakes, protesting, at the same time, that if he were a single man, he would follow me to the world's end to punish such rascality.

“ But as a man of honour, Mr. Holdfast !”

“ As to honour, my lord, why you knows between ourselves. that's a bit of smoke. I've had one taste, and I'm in no hurry for another. I lost eleven pounds two shillings and a penny by taking the honour of the Honourable and Reverend Adolphus Cully, about two years ago.

I cast my eyes upon the bailiff as he mentioned the name of my friend, but as I did not break in upon the thread of his discourse, he continued :

“ Besides, my Lord, here’s Charley can tell you that nothing can be done to-night. There are regular forms in all these here cases. ’

“ Forms,” cried I, “ to secure a robber !”

“ Vhy to be sure, that’s a different kind of a thing, but I don’t think he’ll be got far before to-morrow. It’s a a bad night for travelling, and I dare say he vont get out of London. The evenings are dark, and getting devilish cold. Mayhap a bowl of punch vont be amiss.”

“ His Lordship,” said the lawyer, “ can do nothing in any case at this late hour.”

Of this he endeavoured to convince me, by an unintelligible jargon, which lasted upwards of a quarter of an hour. It was about to close when Mr. Holdfast returned with the punch. Without ceremony my two friends drew their chairs by the fire, and helped themselves to bumpers, wishing me better times.

In the agitation I was in, I followed their example hardly knowing what I was about. I had never been in the habit of using spirituous liquors; a little therefore mounted into my head, and finding that it produced a species of forgetfulness, I indulged myself in frequent visits to the bowl.

I am ashamed to say that the little reason my situation had left me was driven away by intoxication. However, the fatigue and the punch, between them made me sleep sound. In the morning, Giles again posted to Pall Mall, and by the time I was thoroughly awake he returned accompanied by one of the partners of the banking house. The banker proposed the immediate payment of the debt to prevent a further waste of money in expences. I told him that it was a false arrest, and that I did not owe the person who arrested me a single shilling.

He was ready to bail me, but Mr. Holdfast threw a fresh obstacle in the way of my liberation, and insisted upon two securities. In a little time a second was procured, and I once more obtained my freedom, but it was only to learn fresh disasters.

I did not lose a moment in recommending my search after Villiers, in which I now properly procured the assistance of the police officers. But all traces had disappeared. I had no doubt, that in the interval of my confinement he had completely effected his escape beyond the possibility of retaking him, and that he had managed to transfer his ill-gotten wealth either to the Continent or to America.

Hurt as I was in mind and purse, my cup of bitterness was only to the brim ; it had not yet overflowed. Villiers had told me I had yet to know him, for I had still to learn the full extent of his villainy. After having put all the police officers I could meet with upon the scent, I called at my Bankers, and there learnt that on the preceding day, a draft had been presented by Villiers himself for fourteen thousand pounds, which, knowing the confidence I had reposed in him, and not aware of any change in my sentiments, was regularly honoured.

I was positive I had never drawn such a draft, nor had I ever put him in possession of a blank check. The signature, however, was unquestionably my own, and on further examination proved, by certain marks on the paper which I well recollected, and by its being strongly perfumed with otto of roses, to be the carte blanche which I had instructed Villiers to offer to the lady whom I had known under the name of Miss Emma Henderson!

CHAP XII.

SERIOUSNESS.

THE mixture of horrible passions which agitated me at this discovery, and the feelings by which I was almost overwhelmed, I cannot pretend at so distant a period to describe. I had, at all events, the satisfaction of now knowing the worst, for it was not possible for Villiers to have inflicted any further injuries. I had been attacked and defeated on every vulnerable point. In my rage I vowed vengeance against all mankind, and as long as the humour continued, fancied myself a mis-anthrope. By degrees the humour subsided, and I discovered that man was not born to be alone. My reflections were painful in the extreme and I had no person with whom I could communicate. My acquaintance had been hitherto confined to the empty and frivolous, and from them, instead of consolation, I could only expect sneers and taunts.

It was well my mind was occupied with something, for I did not yet entirely relinquish the idea of bringing Villiers to justice, although my hopes were tempered with fears that his plans had been too cautiously laid for me to be successful. The state of my own mind and body prevented me from pursuing the fugitive in person, but I dispatched police officers in all directions. After a few days, I learnt that he had embarked at Yarmouth, not above half an hour previous to the arrival of the officers. I did not suspect the truth of this intelligence, as nearly about the same time, a letter with the Yarmouth post mark, in the hand writing of the scoundrel, was addressed for me to the care of Messrs. Diddle, Crack and Co. with a desire that it might be immediately forwarded to me. It contained an apology for my being locked up, which was an act of necessity, and not of choice. The letter closed with advising me as a friend not to incur unnecessary expenses, as what he had written must convince me that pursuit was useless.

My chagrin was not much diminished by the knowledge that my prey had escaped from me, and I could not help suspecting that the officers had permitted him to embark for reasons best known to themselves. It vexed me to miss my hold of him by such a trifling difference of time. I did not consider that the scent of a slough hound was not keener than that of a Bow

Street runner, but the probability of their choosing to secure their prisoner would depend on the prospect of gain, which these gentlemen of honour would duly weigh and well consider. Villiers had every thing at stake, and could afford to bribe high; I had left the great reward to be settled hereafter. As punishment was my object, full as much, if not more than the recovery of my property, I regretted that I had not offered the moiety of what might be regained, or even the whole, to have glutted my spirit of revenge. In this I should have acted wisely, for I lost the whole as it was.

The money which had fallen into the hands of Villiers was now irrevocably gone. I was thus deprived of my rents which I had set apart for my subsistence, and had lost the whole amount of the cash lying in my bankers hands. From the experience of the past, I felt the absolute necessity of immediate retrenchment. I decided on giving up my town establishment in toto, and considerably reducing that at Bingwood. Embarrassment stared me in the face, for I doubted whether my personal property of every description would now discharge my outstanding debts. At all events there would be nothing left to provide for my expences until the next rent day.

I determined without loss of time to call in the aid of an efficient person for the purpose of ascertaining my actual situation, and to adopt some prudent mode of living for the future. I first thought of Mr. Bearblock, and conceived that having been many years the confidential adviser of my mothers family, he would take a real interest in my welfare. But I soon discarded that idea; satisfied that my state of irritation would but ill accord with his habitual brutality. I was as little capable of bearing reproaches as he was of refraining from the use of them.

The next plan which suggested itself, was to apply for the recommendation of my bankers to some eminent man of the law, in whom I could place a perfect reliance, and who would afford me the requisite assistance, in acting for the present, and advising for the future, and who would, at the same time avoid recurring to the past. They spoke of Mr. Charles Nalder of Lincoln's Inn, in terms of the most unqualified praise. . He was, they said, a man of the first respectability, unshaken integrity, and possessed of an independent fortune acquired by his profession. But what was still better, he was a complete man of business.

I immediately applied at his chambers in Lincoln's Inn, and was informed that Mr. Nalder had been thrown from his horse a few days before, and was confined for the present at his country seat at Shenfield, about fourteen miles from London.

Anxious to suffer as little delay as possible, I requested the bankers to apprise Mr. Nalder of the nature of my business, and of my intention of seeing him at Shenfield on the following day, which unfortunately happened to be Sunday. I was directed to a pretty looking house, newly fitted up in a style of comfort approaching to elegance, situated in a paddock of park like appearance. On my arrival I was ushered into a small study, from whence, after waiting about a quarter of an hour, I was conducted into a parlour, and introduced to a stout formed man, with a countenance marked with severity in every line. He was lying on a sofa, apparently bruised in the leg, and on the forehead ; the latter being ornamented with a black patch, which did not add to the beauty of his appearance. The harsh features of this man are at this moment completely before my eyes.

The symptoms of dislike which I felt rising in my breast were rather increased than diminished by his opening address.

“ My Lord Winterbourne, I presume.”

I bowed—

“ My friends in Pall Mall have sent me a letter. I suppose I have the honour of seeing your Lordship on the business to which it alludes.”

I had heard, I observed, of his accident, which I much regretted for his own sake, as well as for mine, but hoping that its effects were not of that serious nature which would deprive me of the pleasure of conversing with him, I would, if he were perfectly at leisure, explain to him the situation in which I was placed, partly by my own imprudence, and partly by the rascality of others.

“ My Lord, you will excuse the interruption. This is a day expressly set part for the fulfilment of higher duties. It is one on which I would on no consideration suffer the present to interfere with the hereafter. Contrary, to my usual custom, I have received your Lordship, not being aware of the means by which I might have prevented your journey. I shall be gratified with your Lordship's remaining under my humble roof until to-morrow morning, when we will discourse of business as early as you please. I do not profess to be righteous over much, but I trust I know how to fulfil my duties on earth.”

For a time I was puzzled whether to accept the invitation or to decline it ; but as my dependence on Villiers had been hastily placed, I was not sorry to have the opportunity of becoming better acquainted with the person on whom I was about to repose a confidence.

The hours never passed so heavily over my head as during the remaining part of this day. The serious portion of mankind had been totally unknown to me. Although I could not in myself lay much claim to religion I had never been guilty of interfering with the opinion of others. A Sunday evening's frolic, as it was termed, of kicking up a row at a meeting house, I always looked upon with horror, and I considered it but reasonable to allow to others the same latitude of thought which I assumed to myself. My view of society in this respect was liberal, and I had been always led to believe that cheerfulness to a moderate extent was perfectly compatible with the principles of religion and morality. But here every thing was sombre and gloomy. The whole family from the mistress, who in most cases is the head of the house, down to the scullion whom I accidentally saw in the yard at my entrance, were all labouring under the apparent influence of a stiff neck. Every muscle in every face was contracted and drawn into such positions as bid defiance to the entrance of a smile, and all eyes were fixed to the ground with that inflexible steadiness as if death or something worse would be the inevitable consequence of looking up.

Giles, in the kitchen, was not in a much better plight than his master in the parlour, for on his offering the honours of a new acquaintance to the house maid, he had a serious lecture from the footman, which ended in the threat of appealing to the higher powers in case of a repetition of such outrageous conduct. The house maid, Giles said, did not seem to agree with all the doctrines of the footman. The latter condemned the practice of saluting generally, but the former observed that it was improper only on a Sunday. It was with some difficulty that Giles obtained a sop in the pan, and but for the interest made by the house maid in his favour, he might have longed in vain. Giles at night convinced me that the affairs of the kitchen were regulated by those of the parlour; but he declared that if he lived till the morning he would see what the footman and housemaid were both made of.

The dinner party consisted of the host and his wife, two grown up daughters, a son about three and twenty, the clergyman of the parish, and myself. A short time after the cloth was removed, the ladies retired. The father then directed his attention to his son, who appeared to have arrived in the course of the morning from a newly-taken farm. He had all the air of a would-be blood, and aped the manners of a fox-hunter. He was continually practising the knowing whistle, and had made considerable progress towards perfection, but as it was always in an under tone, I could not correctly ascertain his proficiency.

“ I hope, Richard,” said the father, “ that this is the last time you will break in upon the duties of the sabbath. I will excuse it now, and place your arrival here, to anxiety for my own health which has been a little shattered by my recent accident, and to your present unsettled state. But be cautious for the future.”

“ I am sure then, Sir,” answered Richard, “ that my visits here must be rare indeed, if I am to pay what you call proper attention to my farm. I wonder, Sir, you are so extremely scrupulous; for my own part I can see no more harm in travelling on a Sunday than on any other day. Do you, Mr. Hampton?" addressing the clergyman.

"Boy be silent.—You will, I hope, one day do credit to my precept and example. Till then, let not my house be sullied with such scandalous notions. People, my Lord," addressing himself to me, "are apt to exaggerate. I have the character for great riches, and my son here, I am sorry to say it in his presence, is not without the disposition to dissipate what I have so laboriously collected together. But as to my riches the world will find itself mistaken. I have toiled hard, and brought up a large family to honour their Creator. My son, whom you see here, I have just established in a farm of seven hundred a year. I have completely stocked it with every possible requisite. This, Richard," turning to the young man, "is all you can expect from me. I have several other children, all equally deserving of my care, and as far as I can calculate, the provision I have to bestow on each of them, if it amount to what I have advanced to you, will certainly not exceed it. You see, my Lord, unlike some fathers I put my children in the way of elevating themselves in the world before my death, instead of their having to wish to free themselves from my controul, and to share my property, Business I wish to decline ; but if I did, I should, I think, be at times in want of amusement. A rational mind must have variety in its pursuits, and in following business I am satisfied that I am performing the duties of friendship towards those who have been already gainers by my professional assistance. But my comforts are centered in my family and in retirement. However, I must allow that occasional bustle gives greater zest to tranquillity."

A pause of some minutes now ensued, during which our worthy host, leaning back in his chair, fell into a profound sleep, the soundness of which could be ascertained by the snorings emitted from his nasal organs. The third snore was the signal that Mr. Nalder was firmly fixed in his afternoon's nap, which it seems was usually of two hours continuance. The young farmer immediately decamped to see his dogs and horses, which he could assure me were choice in their breeds and well worth looking at, if I would do him the honour to accompany him to the stable. I thought proper to decline the invitation, and Mr. Richard then left the clergyman and myself to entertain one another as we could.

I was fortunate in my decision, for the cheerful conversation of the parson made amends, in some measure for several hours passed in durance vile. He was a man of considerable attainments, as far as a thoughtless being like myself can be allowed to judge. He had seen much and read much, and was in every sense of the word an entertaining companion. His religion was not clouded, like that of my host, with austerity, and his learning was wholly free from pedantry. He talked to amuse and not to shew the extent of his knowledge;—to instruct without assuming the dictatorial formality of a master.

The summons for tea again plunged me into irksomness, for so I denominated seriousness. Mr. Nalder awoke, and every thing was paralyzed. He slept again, but his slumbers were now broken. A word awoke him, and continuation of words running into sentences kept him from repose. Silence was the order of the day. Richard made his escape to his farm, and the parson to his home, leaving Lord Viscount Winterbourne to the exertion of his faculties to keep himself from gaping.

Never, in the whole course of my life, did I hail the hour of retiring to rest with such heartfelt satisfaction. Ten o'clock at last sounded, and the whole tribe of domestics, Giles into the bargain, with an undertaker's solemnity, entered the room to listen to the evening prayer, and to a long exhortation upon the duty of keeping the sabbath day holy, during which Giles's eyes were directed to the house maid. This ended, I cheerfully betook myself to rest.

The contrast between the gravity and steadiness of my new adviser, and the levity of my old associate, exhibited the former, maugre his seriousness, in a far preferable point of view than I should otherwise have placed him. I felt a little inclined to charge him with hypocrisy; but I reflected that God alone could judge the heart. At all events he had age and experience to direct me, and the respectability of his character, as well as his situation in life, held out to me an assurance that my confidence would not be misplaced. Whatever dislike I entertained towards his manners, I rested satisfied that reliance might be placed on his integrity. My further communication would be on business, and it would be my own fault, if I did not steer clear of again trespassing on a Sunday.

CHAP. XIII.CONDOLENCE.

I AROSE early, and found the whole family, the nominal head of it excepted, at their morning's devotion. Mr. Nalder was too great an invalid to attend the breakfast table. That I might be no incumbrance to the ladies, or interfere with their domestic occupations, (Mrs. Nalder having informed me that her daughters were patterns of notability, and would do credit to a husband in the highest station), I requested permission to view the pleasure grounds. It was kindly kindly acceded to, and I esteemed myself fortunate that the rain in the night had made the new formed walks too wet to allow either of the Miss Nalders to accompany me. Every thing about me bore the marks of considerable labour and incalculable expence. Little as I then knew of rural economy, I could neither compliment the proprietor upon his taste or his prudence. But as I well knew there was no accounting for the freaks and vagaries of that capricious jade Fancy, and as I wished to entertain a high opinion of my host's judgement, I concluded that a park and pleasure grounds, formed upon a strong tenacious sour clay, was congenial to the temper and disposition of the owner.

On my return to the house I found Mr. Nalder ready to receive me. Before a person of such rigid principles I felt no small embarrassment in laying open my case. The marks of folly were so indelibly stamped upon all my proceedings, that I trembled at the censure of so strict a moralist. I had squandered away an immense sum of money, and through my weakness I had been swindled of as much more. I had to bring myself to the painful confession, that in the course of a few months, I had made away with property and contracted debts to the amount of the whole savings of a minority commencing with my birth.

I was permitted to go on with my story without interruption. When I had ended, I requested the favour of his advice as to my future conduct; at the same time begging him to be as lenient as possible in any reference he might think necessary to make to the past.

“Advice, my Lord,” said he, “is easily given, but is not so easily followed. I will spare your feelings, and make no comments upon what you you have told me. It is to the future only that your attention should be fixed, unless it happen that you cast your eye upon the past, as a warning to avoid the recurrence of similar acts of imprudence."

My mind was relieved from a load, and I took courage to proceed.

"You are right, Sir," was my reply. "It is to the future only that I can look with pleasure. What steps do you recommend?"

"I can recommend nothing, until I feel satisfied of your inclination to adopt my suggestions. It is a common practice to ask the opinion of others, and then to act in diametrical opposition, on a previous determination. Excuse my freedom, my Lord."

"Your inference, I am sorry to say, Mr. Nalder, is frequently but too just. In my case, however, there is a material difference. I come to you by the recommendations of my friends, not so much to ask for advice as to request your active interference in my affairs."

"Then your Lordship must on no account interfere with me. My character and reputation are at stake with every business I undertake, and I feel a proud satisfaction in the consequence which my name gives to every thing which passes through my hands. It is too late in the day for me to appear a trifler in the eyes of the world. Your affairs, seemingly, have not prospered under your own hands; let us see what success will attend them under mine. But I must be uncontrolled!"

"I am willing you should be so. I have a confidence in your integrity, and a perfect reliance on your judgment."

"Why then, look ye, my Lord.—My advice is summed up in very few words. Instantly get at the knowledge of the real state of your affairs, and leave nothing whatever to conjecture.

This can only be accomplished by calling in your debts. You must dispose of your town establishment with all possible expedition ; and, let the cost be what it will, you must again be free and unincumbered. This, it appears from your statement, may be done without much difficulty."

My pride caught the alarm at these public proceedings, although I could not dispute their propriety. Every one feels an apprehension that what passes in his private thoughts is known to the whole world. The effect of an advertisement, I thought, would be to announce my folly and weakness, and would convey the idea that my situation was much worse than was really the case. But my word had just been pledged to Mr. Nalder, to abide by his decision. To object therefore, would be to expose myself to a charge of irresolution. After some little hesitation I consented.

“ I must now have your lordship’s written authority to act as I may deem most conducive to your lordship’s welfare.”

My recent sufferings from a breach of confidence induced me to pause at this demand. I attempted to evade it, by saying that I did not apprehend such a thing would be necessary, as I could always be referred to for the purpose of affording my sanction to whatever arrangements he recommended. But Mr. Nalder declared it impossible for him to act without such a document. “ Besides,” he added, “ it is more a matter of satisfaction to myself. It may be recalled at any time.”

I agreed to this also, but hinted that I thought nothing further would now be wanting. However, I was mistaken, for I found, that to have a lawyer in your confidence was to be in his power, and the first step to his obtaining that power, was the possession of the title-deeds, papers, and secrets of his clients.

The records of my mother's family, from the earliest periods, were dispatched to Lincoln's Inn, as soon as I returned to London. Mr. Bearblock, my surviving trustee, between whom and Mr. Nalder there was something of an ancient grudge, was also called upon by my new lawyer. He denied being in possession of any papers, and pleaded his full and entire discharge, under my own hand. A bill in Chancery was then filed against him, calling upon him to make certain discoveries, and to render a complete statement of accounts. Thus, although the payment of present debts, and the arrangement for the future were the only points professedly under consideration, I found myself dragged into an inexplicable labyrinth regarding the past.

The next step was of a most galling nature. It was a public advertisement, desiring the creditors of the Right Honourable Lord Viscount Winterbourne, to send the amount of their respective demands to Charles Nalder, Esq. of Lincoln's Inn, in order to their being immediately adjusted and discharged.

This, as I expected, brought me innumerable letters of condolence from my quondam acquaintance, "sorry to hear of my present situation." The Marquis of Bumblefoot always knew what a rogue I had to deal with, and wisely foresaw what the end would be, but did not think I had been done so neatly. Lord George Saville, a professed gamester, lamented that I had not placed myself under his tuition, he would have guarded me against foul play,—all foul play, I suppose, but his own. My friend, the Earl of Cullymore, expressed his sincere sorrow for what had happened to me, and kindly told me, that in about a year, or a year and a half, he should be able to lend me a little money—what I had lent him had escaped his memory. I had one comfort, at least, in my distresses, if they can in reality be so called: my late associates had no further hopes of obtaining any thing from me. They permitted me to act as I pleased without personal molestation. Few of the self-dubbed fashionables were in town, and those few had but little ambition to connect themselves with a man who was represented by fame as ruined: past redemption. Thus what I contemplated as an imaginary evil, turned out a most positive good.

My father's creditors pressed round about me, to know whether my debts were to be paid: by cutting off the entail of part of the Erpingham estates. In that case they looked for their share in the spoil. When I assured them that I had not the most distant idea of such a thing, they shrugged up their shoulders and left me. One of them I civilly kicked down stairs for daring to tell me that I was little better than my father. I caught fire too soon, or I should otherwise have liked to have known the exact degree of comparison in which I should have been placed. The same evening, I was taken by a warrant to Bow Street, and found bail for the assault. But as I never heard any more of the business, I suppose my friend imagined that the kicks were an ample compensation for my share of the debt.

My own wine-merchant, in a fright, on being told that I had not the most distant intention of raising money in conjunction with my father, offered to take the remainder of my stock of wines off my hands, at the same rate he had at first charged it. I should willingly have complied with his offer, but on further conversation, it was to be clogged with a sale upon the premises, of " Lord Viscount Winterbourne's stock of wines." In the general alarm among my creditors, occasioned by the conviction of my being completely done up, I verily believe that they would eagerly have seized a composition of five shillings in the pound.

I must do Nalder the justice to say, that in the settlement of the tradesmen's accounts, he was of the most eminent service to me. In this business, the letter from Messrs. Perchpole to Villiers proved of essential importance. These worthy gentlemen chose to deduct the thirty per cent from the whole amount of their bill, rather than leave the case to the settlement of a London jury. Nalder played off the same artillery to the upholsterer, the amount of whose demand I am ashamed to mention. Nalder charged him with an agreement to allow Villiers thirty per cent.; of this he alleged he could furnish ample proof. The terror of Mr. Drapery proved the charge to be well-founded. He quietly submitted to the deduction, and, I am satisfied, was still an immense gainer.

After much discussion, the wine-merchant chose to accept the payment of his demand, with an allowance of twenty per cent, under the shape of a discount for prompt payment. His usual credit to the nobility being, he said, two years.

When all the demands upon me were satisfied, my funded property was completely exhausted. The balance in my banker's hands was but a trifle; and, with the exception of that trifle, which was wholly inadequate to my wants on the most moderate scale, I was without the means of procuring cash in a regular way for five months to come.

The sale of my house in London would have afforded an ample supply, and I was anxious to take the advice of Mr. Drapery, and to dispose of it with the furniture as it stood. But at this season of the year, it was doubtful when a purchaser could be found, and in the interim I should be penniless. To have borrowed, in case I met with any person inclined to lend, would have been degrading to me. I therefore resolved upon the immediate sale of my furniture and effects, in Grosvenor Square, by auction. The wines I had intended should be removed to Bingwood; but, upon the suggestion of Mr. Smirke, the auctioneer, who was, I imagine, loth to lose any part of his commission, I agreed to reserve only such parts as did not reach a full value at the sale. The house was to be sold as soon as possible; thus closing for ever the scene of my early follies. My short career of grandeur and magnificence had nothing brilliant to make it palatable to the recollection. It was entered upon without thought, and put an end to without regret, at least for its own sake. It was attended with no other effect than that of consuming an immense sum of money, and teaching me to despise myself.

My property, I was told, sold uncommonly well; the sale producing very nearly one third, not of what the things were charged by the respective tradesmen, but of what they had actually cost me. However it afforded ready cash, and I was half inclined to think myself fortunate in saving even that pittance from the wreck of my personal fortune.

In the firm determination of making the best of a bad business, I retraced my steps to Bingwood, with the intention of arranging my affairs there, and of then seeking amusement in a continual change of scene. The world, I thought, was wide enough, and I thought it would be hard if I should be the only person who could not find pleasure in some part of it or other. I felt myself incapable of remaining at home without society, and the society to which I had been hitherto accustomed had become thoroughly hateful to me.

CHAP. XIV.

DESTINY.

THE person who sits down for the purpose of relating to the world the occurrences of his life, and who has commenced his career of authorship by such relation, is apt to consider that his task is easy;—that he has nothing more to do than to describe events which are treasured up in his memory, or which force themselves upon his recollection; and to paint those sensations which always accompany the recalling of past scenes.

A few pages convince him of the erroneous opinion he has entertained, and point out to him the impossibility of conveying to the reader, by the pen of maturity, those feelings and ideas which arose spontaneously in the mind during the first effervescence of youthful passions. The writer, weary of the world, sick of its follies, and shocked at its vices, views the active pursuits of life through a false medium. The conduct which he now condemns he formerly practised, and is yet unwilling to confess it; while self-love induces him, unintentionally, to find excuses for such parts of his former actions as appear discordant with sober reflection.

It was my intention to have given a faithful account of my progress through life; but on looking back upon what I have already written, how many glaring instances of folly are unnoticed, and yet there are sufficient to stamp me a fool;—how many marks of vice are unmentioned, and yet there are sufficient to prove the absence of virtuous principles. I feel myself incapable of depicting, with the proper warmth of colouring, the rise and advancement of those operations of the mind, which, although they serve to bias the future cast of character, and are perfectly consonant with the levity and inexperience natural to an early entrance into life, are wholly unworthy the regard of those who are fast verging towards the grave. I can call to mind most of the effects, but the causes are beyond me.

Shakespeare has divided the usual period allotted to man's existence into seven ages. But he drew from the general mass, and not from particular species. The life of an individual, whom fortune has placed in the higher ranks of society, may commonly be reduced to three ;—the age of expectation, the age of enjoyment, and the age of satiety. The space of time which each occupies is variable as the winds, nor is the order more strictly observed. But be the pursuit ambition or pleasure, business or idleness, the division is still the same. Early wisdom is frequently closed with mature folly; and in some rare instances, the age of enjoyment has left little or nothing of room for the other two. My life has been passed chiefly under the influence of the first or the last, leaving scarcely any space for the middle age.

Such, however, is the proneness of man to endeavour to gain the good opinion of himself, that let his years be what they may, he is anxious to palliate those things which his heart secretly disapproves. He is apt to view the world as the connoisseur views a picture, in which shades are requisite to give effect to light, and where defects often tend to the developement of beauties. The necessity of contrast is but too obvious. Turbulence would not be called patriotism if real patriotism existed ;—without virtue, vice would be stripped of its deformity ; and without vice, virtue would lose half its charms.

The spendthrift considers, “ that old families, like old besoms, will wear down to the stumps and finally fret out,” and that it would be useless to set himself in opposition to fate. He may also reason patriotically, that unless old families contrived within themselves the means of moving off the hinges, new families would be unable to find room to display themselves. If he thinks at all, he would perhaps consider, as an excuse for his extravagance, that it is the dissipation of one part of the kingdom that affords an opportunity to the other to aggrandize itself. He may therefore say, that he acts from principle. As a nation, our prosperity, if not occasioned, is at least upheld by those grand stimuli to industry, the possession of wealth and honours. The wasteful expenditure of the nobility then, may find advocates among themselves. Sophistry will call it a national good, as affording the means of conferring property on those who know how to take care of it; and, at all events, the money of the spendthrift cannot get into worse hands, but must, in every case, move into the possession of those more likely to circulate it to the general advantage. The loss is to the individual, who parts with what he does not want, and is unable to enjoy;—the gain is to the country at large, which is sure to benefit by the change.

I am far from being the only one who has resorted to this species of reasoning. The expenditure of a considerable fortune had procured me no rational enjoyment, nor had my recollection any single action to dwell upon with pleasure. I have endeavoured to comfort myself that I had been cheated of the greater part, and that I was in reality, more unfortunate than culpable. But here I deceived myself. Misfortune, I found, in my own case, was only another name for imprudence; and I believe it to be the same in most other cases. Whilst one part of mankind laughed at my egregious folly, another lamented my weakness and ignorance, and a third scoffed at my vices. But the most acute of all my mental sufferings arose from those kind friends, who chose to express their pity for me, especially for having been the dupe of a designing scoundrel.

I was not permitted to chew the hard crust of disappointment and vexation in silence. But that I might be quite certain as to the character of my former associate, supposing that I could possibly still entertain the smallest doubt on that head, I hardly met a person to whom custom had authorized the freedom of addressing me, who had not some information to give me relative to my former bosom friend, particularly those who were anxious to supply his place in my establishment.—“It was strange,” I was frequently told, “that a man of my sense should be so blindly infatuated, in a matter that was apparent to the most superficial observer.” This expression was usually followed by a proffer of services, and a tender of sincere regard. But I was now thoroughly convinced that I was not a man of sense, and I began to entertain but a mean opinion of the good sense and common honesty of those, who chose again to promulgate such a discovery in my hearing. At all events, I had the sense to perceive that I had acted like a fool, and the confidence in my own judgment, to determine from that time forward to see with my own eyes, hear with my own ears, and act from my own impulse, however much my faculties chose subsequently to mislead me.

I regulated my affairs at Bingwood as far as I was capable of doing. I discharged all useless hands and useless heads, and reduced my establishment to a complete bachelor's scale. I promoted Giles to the double office of head groom and valet de chambre. My French gentleman I had parted with in London, and I no longer needed a house steward to regulate accounts, which were perfectly within the scope of my old house-keeper. I retained no more horses than I actually wanted. These compared with the total number of my stud, were, few indeed. The rest were sent to the hammer, and I had again to learn the difference between buying and selling.

My stay at Bingwood was short. To enjoy the sports of the field, or indeed any other pleasureable occupation, it is necessary that every one should carry at least one half of his amusement with him. This was far from being my case. The scenes which might have charmed me in early years, were no longer capable of yielding that zest with which I had formerly viewed them, "when hope was kind and friendship seemed sincere." I cannot finish the verse as applicable to my own case, for instead of purchasing "sorrow with a tear," I had bought it for two hundred and fifty thousand pounds. To say the truth, I was too much out of humour with myself and every thing about me, to derive pleasure in any situation, but particularly in one where every object only served to remind me of what I now was, and what I had been.

My mind was soon made up to leave Bingwood, in search of that, which Bingwood could not produce.

But in the pursuit of happiness it is not easy, when all places are alike, to fix on one most likely to afford it. Following the practice of a knight errant of yore, I suffered myself in my peregrinations to be directed by chance. I had no fixed object, but to get rid of myself;—no settled pursuit but to divert my mind from dwelling upon evils which were irremediable. The whole world was before me, and preference I had none. Had a native of North Britain been similarly circumstanced, he would infallibly have directed his steps southwards, and that without a moment's hesitation, in case he had not passed the latitude of London. A valetudinarian would have been guided by the weather-cock, and if inclined to hypochondriacism would have constantly left the Eastern blast in his rear. But the north pole had not that repelling effect upon my constitution, that it has upon the loosened Scot, and my health was too good to allow me to give way to vapours.

In this dilemma of uncertainty and indecision, I remember waiting with the hind wheels of my phaeton between the lodge gates, my two grooms being patiently stationed in the rear. Chance or fate saved me the trouble of deciding. The situation of Rome was settled by a flight of six vultures. But my destiny was concluded upon in a more humble way, by the bite of a forest fly upon one of the horses rumps. Being full blood, high fed, and little worked, for they had been in a state of quiescence during my late London excursion, my cattle had got a little above themselves, and beyond my controul; and although quadrupeds may not be so tender in an attack upon the seat of honour as bipeds, they would be equally apt to start at the piercing proboscis of these travelling freebooters.

The horse made a plunge, and I suppose communicated to his companion the insult he had received, and claimed his sympathy, for they both set off at full speed, to the no small hazard of my neck. The roads were luckily good, wide, and free from interruption, and I managed to arrest their progress at the expiration of about the third mile. I then awaited the arrival of Giles, and the other groom, but before they came up I discovered, that unknown to myself, my serious intention had been to proceed to Bath. Probably this determination was started in my mind, by the horses, without asking my consent, having thought proper to take an opposite direction.

I thought I should look like a simpleton if I was seen to measure my steps back again, and therefore, finally decided in favour of Harrowgate; at which place, on the forenoon of the second day, according to my banker's phrase, "I safely arrived in due course."

CHAP. XV.

L'ENTRE SOL.

ON my arrival at Harrowgate, I drove up to the inn which made the most substantial appearance, and, as I alighted, expressed my intention of remaining a few days. The customs here were such as I had never before met with. The jumbling together of visitors of all descriptions was wholly new to me. Peers and periwig makers, peeresses and mantua makers; the wives of baronets, and the wives of butchers were all amalgamated in one shapeless mass. Two hotels, or rather boarding houses, for they partook more of the latter denomination than the former, composed the extent of the accommodations which the place afforded, and the inmates of each satisfied the cravings of the appetite at a public table. In my days of false pride and empty consequence, I should have considered my remaining in such a situation as a degradation to nobility, and should instantly have left the place, without paying any regard to my tired horses, in case I could not have experienced the style of accommodation to which I had been regularly accustomed. But my plan was now to amuse my mind at any rate, and after the pillage I had undergone, I did not feel the less inclination to join the general assemblage, when I was given to understand that my expences would be reduced below that on which I had previously supposed it possible that any human being could exist.

But if all noblemen knew the value of money, my remarks in the last chapter would be wasted.

I took possession of my sleeping apartment, which had just been quitted by a London cheesemonger, and with some difficulty obtained the exclusive use of a sitting room; for which, by the bye, I found that I had no occasion. A sitting room was a sine qua non of my remaining at the hotel, and as I suppose they did not wish to lose me, a Mr. Solomons, they told me, had yielded up his apartment for my accommodation.

At the ringing of the first dinner bell, I entered the drawing room, at one end of which were seated three ladies, who appeared to have long passed the bloom of youth. These ladies I afterwards found were Mrs. Dunder, the widow of the late Dean of ———, fine, fat and fussy; and the Misses Cornelia and Euphemia Side-bottom, two spinsters of moderate fortune, whose usual place of residence was in the neighbourhood of Skipton in Craven, but who usually, as well as Mrs. Dunder devoted some few months of the year in an excursion to some of the fashionable watering places.

The ladies rose from their seats, which I supposed was the usual compliment to a stranger, but they soon resumed them. In return I made one of my most graceful bows. The conversation, which my entering the room had suspended for a moment, was now resumed, without my being any further noticed. This I must own, a little nettled me, as I had not only made one of my best bows, but had also settled my mouth to a most agreeable smile. This it appears was the usual fate of commoners, who were left to struggle into notoriety as they could. On consideration I thought it highly reasonable, seeing that the only way in which a person can enlarge the circle of his acquaintance is to render himself pleasing, and to adopt a style of manners suitable to the individual whom he is desirous of cultivating. The most formidable engine is flattery, which when well applied is infallible. Now as every person at first entrance into a boarding house is called upon to render homage to the old stagers, it is but fair they should be tickled in their turn, by those who are entering upon their noviciate.

In my case, the apparent neglect was entirely owing to their not being informed that I was a sprig of nobility. The appellation of "my Lord," from the mouth of Giles, who at dinner stood behind my chair in a superb livery, the remnant of my former folly, appeared to have a wondrous effect upon the whole party, and upon the three ladies I have already mentioned, in particular. From that moment my plate was crowded with tit bits. From one end of the table to the other, it was, “ pray, my Lord, allow me to help you to this.”—“ Do me the honour, my Lord, to taste this upon my judgment, I can assure your Lordship it is excellent.”—“ Shall I have the pleasure of drinking a glass of wine with your Lordship, &c. &c. &c.” From that time I was loaded with civilities. Constant enquiries, were made as to how I passed the night, and some of the party even went so far as pay their personal respects to Traveller my Danish dog, who generally held his court in the stable, but who by special invitation sometimes entered the sitting room, where he was an object of universal admiration, and was allowed to be the most beautiful dog that ever was seen. Giles — But in the order of my story I have not yet got out of the drawing room.

Being left to my own discretion, I seated myself in one of the windows in expectation of seeing something that was capable of affording amusement. Several odd looking personages approached towards the door of our hotel, having among them some of the most disgusting objects I ever beheld. These, I was informed, were just under the influence of the water, which had successfully operated in clearing away the impurities from the rest of the company. This was enough, and I made up my mind to bid farewell to Harrowgate as soon as possible.

Miss Euphemia Sidebottom at last directed the general attention to the group below us by exclaiming, " Well, dear me, here is Doctor Bubbleby at last. I declare I shall so abuse him for leaving us. But he is such a delightful companion that I do not wonder at Mrs. Bubbleby detaining him as long as she can."

"Indeed, Miss Sidebottom," said Mrs. Dunder, addressing herself to the eldest of these four spinsters, "I think Mrs. Bubbleby would have good reasons for detaining the doctor if she knew the danger she runs from your sister's partiality."

"Well," added Euphemia, "I say and say again that the doctor is one of the most delightful men in the world"

"There, sister, I fully agree with you," said Cornelia, "and I do not see that at our time of life ———"

"Our time of life!" roared out Euphemia, "I wish sister you knew how to conduct yourself. Our time of life indeed! If I was as old as some people there might ———"

"Why, lord! sister," retorted Cornelia, "you know there is only ———"

Miss Euphemia's colour was mounting in her cheeks, and I began to be apprehensive lest Miss Cornelia's head dress should suffer in an attack which was certainly projected, and put into a train for execution, when Mrs. Dunder arrested the further progress of this unhappy dispute by saying, "But, my dear Miss Euphemia," laying a strong emphasis upon the word Miss, which might be construed in two ways, "pray recollect that Mrs. Bubbleby is not dead yet, and that, according to the doctor's account, she is not even ailing."

This little fracas was finally terminated in a drawn battle by the entrance of the hero himself, accompanied by the party I had observed from the window. On the mention of a name we are apt to draw a portrait in the imagination of the person bearing it. To certain sounds, the mind, we know not why, insensibly attaches certain ideas. The name of Bubbleby was associated in my fancy with a personage of vast bulk and bloated features, to which a bushy well powdered wig had been added together with the appellation of doctor. On one point however I was at a loss, for not knowing whether he was a doctor of law, physic, or divinity, I could not put a gold headed cane in his hand till I was assured that he was a follower of Galen and Hippocrates, in which capacity I was more than half inclined to consider him.

My surprise was proportioned to the extent of the difference between the original, and the picture I had drawn. Doctor Bubbleby was below the lowest military standard, and had more the appearance of being the shadow than the substance of a man. As nature had not departed from her regular plan, and had not distinguished the doctor from the rest of frail mortality, by the gift of perpetual youth, she had exerted herself to make him amends, in some degree, by gracing his features with a perpetual smile. The doctor appeared pleased with himself, and with all the world. He was seemingly between forty-five and fifty years of age, perhaps more inclining to the latter. He had sharp lively features and his grey hair curling over a high forehead gave him an air of dignity notwithstanding his diminutive size. He was altogether a man of rather prepossessing appearance at first sight.

The doctor, with a half bow and a smile to every one as he passed by, made his way to Mrs. Dunder and the Miss Sidebottoms, who welcomed his return with warm congratulations on his looks, and tender enquiries after the Bubbleby family.

“A thousand thanks, my dear, dear ladies,” answered the Doctor, “for your kind and affectionate solicitude. But you are as good and as handsome as ever. How does my dear Mrs. Dunder find himself."

"Oh lord; doctor," said the dame, "I am neither good nor handsome. It is time for us old women to lay by."

The Miss Sidebottoms bit their lips and frowned.

"Ah! my dear madam," observed the Doctor, as he squeezed the matron's hand, "how you love to joke. But the only weakness I ever could discover in the character of Mrs. Dunder, is her not putting a sufficient estimation upon her worthy self."

Mrs. Dunder drew up her chest, returned the doctor's smile, looked round the room, and at last suffered her eyes to rest upon the two spinsters.

The conversation now became general. The several occupations of the morning formed ample topics of discourse. The doctor had something to say to every one, tending to promote the general good humour. He rejoiced at every one's pleasures and partook of every one's pains,—regretted their little disappointments and shared their satisfaction. I was not omitted in the general crowd, for the doctor observing that I belonged to nobody, addressed me on a subject interesting to every body, and told me that it had been a remarkable fine day for the season of the year, but that the morning had been uncommonly cold.

I directed my attention to the other characters, but as they were not calculated to excite any extraordinary interest in my mind, and did not shew any striking peculiarities, I shall pass them over for the present, with the exception of a lady of the name of Berrington and her two daughters. They had visited Harrowgate for the health of the youngest daughter, and their arrival preceded mine about a week. They were the only persons in the group with whom I entertained the least desire of further intercourse.

As I subsequently so far forgot nobility as to fall desperately in love with the eldest Miss Berrington, it may be expected that I should say something respecting her, either here or elsewhere. But I shall cautiously abstain from all personal description in her case, having been led to believe that glowing pictures of female charms are neither expected nor tolerated. To speak of the beauty of Lydia Berrington without rapture, and to indulge in rapture without yielding to an enthusiastic ardour, is more than I can accomplish. I will therefore be silent. To me she was every thing that was amiable and lovely, and although upwards of forty years have passed over my head, since my first meeting with her, and as many since I last saw her, I still fondly cherish the tender recollection of the only being to whom I was ever seriously attached.

The figure depicted in my mind's eye, even at this distance of time, is one of perfect beauty. In the delineation of what the heart alone can feel how much must the tongue or the pen fall short. Besides, I have another reason for keeping clear of minutiae,—I am anxious that the world should admire her as I have done. If I describe features and complexion, let them be what they will, I shall only please a few, and be ridiculed by the remainder for my want of taste. The black headed descendant of the torrid zone will wonder how any female can claim pretensions to beauty, whose hair is not of those delightful glowing tints which approach to redness; and on the other hand the fair haired inhabitants of the temperate and frozen regions will express an equal admiration of black locks and dark complexions. Now as Lydia Berrington was unlike every other woman chance has thrown in my way, by describing her I shall infallibly offend the fairest parts of nature's works, who as they are apt to estimate the standard of beauty by their own charms, independent of being angry, would accuse me of a want of discernment in attributing perfection to qualities and qualifications they do not themselves possess.

It may be urged against me, that having said she was like no other woman, I could offend none by the portraiture. This is wrong. The Venus de Medici is the allowed perfection of the female form; but, every female can find something which she considers to constitute resemblance. A piece of sculpture can only give an idea of form and feature. I may describe Lydia Barrington in the same manner and few will be found to quarrel with the drawing, provided that it be done in Indian ink or chalks, but if I call in the assistance of Beechey or Lawrence and paint her in oils,—if I add to the picture, that calm benignity which gave the features their peculiar expression: if——. But beauty after all is so much the child of fancy, and Cupid so completely blinds the eyes of his victims, that they are apt to mistake the amiable qualities of the mind for personal charms, or perhaps, like Queen Titania with Bottom the weaver, become “spell bound.”

END OF VOL. I.

SOME ACCOUNT

OF

MYSELF.

10

10

SOME ACCOUNT OF MYSELF.

BY
CHARLES EARL OF ERPINGHAM,
&c. &c. &c.

IN Four Volumes.

“ It is my intention to represent Characters such as they are in life ; but Heaven forbid that I should pourtray any person in particular.”—

LE SAGE.

VOL. II.

LONDON:
PRINTED FOR W. SIMPKIN & R. MARSHALL,
Stationers' Court, Ludgate Street.

1817.

100-443887-1

Plummer and Brewis, Printers, Love Lane, Eastcheap.

SOME ACCOUNT

OF

MYSELF.

CHAP. I.

DINNER.

THE second bell summoned the party to the dining parlour, and every person in the room, myself excepted, rushed to the feast with eager haste. I slowly brought up the rear, and was assigned a place at the lower end of the table. Until my introduction to a boarding house dinner at Harrowgate, I was at a loss to form an exact idea of that peculiar sensation which the French mean to convey by the term mauvaise honte, and which they so justly place in opposition to amour propre. It was now clearly explained to me. How the lively Frenchman avoids the feelings so natural to a person on finding himself encircled with faces wholly strange to him, and deprived of the presence of every person with whom he had previously held intercourse, I know not. But I have no right to judge of another from myself. An Englishman, although naturally a gregarious animal, is shy of giving to strangers an hasty admission into his society. Perhaps it is the unavoidable consequence of our foggy climate, for even the dogs act under a similar impulse. I have observed in travelling, that a considerable time has elapsed before Traveller would venture to mingle freely with his fourfooted companions. Traveller and his master, in this situation bore much resemblance to each other, for I am certain that

Traveller did not feel more awkwardness on his first entrance into the stable yard than his master did at taking his seat at the lower end of the boarding table, the situation allotted by prescription to all new comers.

Giles, as I have already mentioned, soon promulgated my title. At the moment I was tempted to wish my title at the devil, and myself into the bargain. I found every eye directed towards me. I thought that my follies were legibly written on my countenance, and that every one was engaged in the perusal of them. A general restraint was apparent. The conversation halted; so much so, that the sallies of wit and marks of vivacity which I expected, from what I seen and heard, would have escaped from the lips of the Reverend Doctor, remained in store for some future occasion. The laborious exertion of eating and drinking, with the little attentions of carving and helping, happily in a great degree supplied the deficiency of words which were literally confined to the employments of the table. The novelty of the scene before me made amends for the awkwardness I felt. Accustomed as I had previously been to the luxuries of a table furnished out in the first style of taste and splendour, where the pallied appetites of the party, so far from suffering them to betray any symptoms of hunger, turned with disgust from the greatest dainties, and where piquant stimulant sauces were requisite to give a temporary tone to the relaxed and debilitated stomach, the sight of a number of persons devouring flesh with the voracity of cannibals, not a little surprised me. In dental exertion the women vied with the men. The half crammed mouth vociferated for more, and seemed eager to obtain a fresh supply before the present stock was quite exhausted. The clang of knives and forks was, however, frequently drowned by exclamations for ale and other potations. In short, the whole party appeared to be dining upon Macbeth's maxim of "D——d be he that first cries hold! enough!"

But all pleasures are fleeting, and luxuries are fated to pall the most outrageous appetite. The cravings of nature were partially silenced by repletion, and the company again found leisure and ability to mingle in "table talk" upon the usual empty topics. During the whole time of dinner Dr. Bubbleby's brain had only elicited two sparks of wit; this I thought remarkable in one whom I had led myself to consider had that article at his fingers ends. He observed when cutting up a duck that the clergy were very unfit companions for the bird before him, and therefore called for the assistance of a layman, meaning a lemon to render it palatable. At this Miss Euphemia

Sidebottom laughed most immoderately, and was supported in an under tone by those in her immediate neighbourhood, who were doubtless equally with herself the admirers of genius. The other ebullition of his humour was towards the close of the repast, when he declared it was enough to make a parson swear, for that it was curst hard he could not get at any custard. Here Mrs. Dunder and Miss Cornelia Sidebottom reproved the doctor for his immorality, and for the very bad example which he, who ought to be a pattern of every thing proper and amiable, had set to those who would naturally look up to him for advice and instruction. Miss Sidebottom in particular observed that practice was superior to preaching, and that the doctor's future exhortations would lose their weight with her. The doctor thanked his dear friends for their kind and considerate reproof. A word from the wise was what he always treasured in his mind.

The two ladies elevated their heads and looking at each other with peculiar complacency, seemed to accept the doctor's apology. They then dropped the subject.

Shortly after the removal of the cloth, the dining room was left to the lords of the creation. The custom in these places which allows to every man the use of his own wine as he pleases, appeared to be founded on an independent principle, and as such afforded me considerable satisfaction. As I had naturally a strong aversion to immoderate drinking, the rapid circulation of the bottle with bumper toasts, and other practices of good-fellowship, had frequently been viewed by me with that unconquerable disgust which effectually destroys the original intention of mingling with society,—the interchange of ideas. But in the plan which is generally, and I believe universally adopted at tables of this description, each has the power of acting as inclination prompts. The drunkard may wind up his nerves to the required pitch of high spirits to converse with the water drinker, and the good breeding of the man of moderation need never be put to the blush on withholding from those excesses, which do present harm and future mischief. Liberty of action, like liberty of conscience, is equally beneficial in giving full scope to the colloquial powers, and is essentially necessary to the positive enjoyment of ease and comfort.

We had not long been deprived of the society of the ladies, when Dr. Bubbleby removed from the situation he had occupied at dinner to a chair which a lady had left vacant immediately opposite to that in which I was placed. With that placid smile which seemed the inseparable companion of the doctor's mouth, he welcomed me to Harrowgate, and expressed his sorrow that his previous ignorance of my rank had deprived him of the pleasure of earlier paying his devoirs. The waters he told me had effected some most extraordinary cures, which I might witness, if I honoured Harrowgate for a fortnight with my presence, in the altered countenances of some of the party with whom I had dined.

“Your Lordship, I presume,” continued the doctor, “is here on a tour of pleasure, for you will allow me to observe, that with your Lordship's looks, it is utterly impossible that health can be your object——”

“Pleasure!” exclaimed a voice which proceeded from a bulky carcase on my left hand, who now, for the first time, uttered a sound; the close attendance during dinner of a servant every way worthy of such a master, having rendered any exertion of the vocal organs unnecessary. He touched his glass when he was desirous that it should be replenished, and his plate, pointing to any particular dish, which he was desirous of tasting. I must not, however, do my friend the injustice to say that he made no noise, for on Dr. Bubbleby putting the wing, leg, and breast of a duck upon his plate, and at the same time requesting to know if what he had done was to my friend's liking, I involuntarily started and turned round on hearing a sound somewhat between a groan and a grunt. I must call him my friend in this instance, as I had not the honour of knowing his patronimic appellation till the following morning.

——“Pleasure! pleasure at Harrowgate!” said my friend.

“Aye, Sir!” cried the Doctor, bridling up, and repeating the words—“pleasure at Harrowgate! such pleasure, my good Sir, as you and every other rational man may enjoy. Free from the world and its cares, you may here meet with every thing that can render life desirable. } You may ramble free and uncontrolled amidst the beauties of nature in all her dresses, from the desert heath to the cultivated valley; and when tired of revelling in the luxuries of the imagination——”

“ Luxuries of what?” grunted out my friend.

“ —— Of imagination, Sir! and when tired I say, with delights, you may unbend in the society of persons capable of blending amusement with instruction. Such is Harrowgate, my Lord——”

“ Humph!” humph-ed my friend, as as he settled himself to answer and instruct us by ungentle slumbers.

The doctor, again in the possession of the field, once more addressed his discourse to me, and observed, that he should feel highly gratified at having an opportunity of proving his profound respect. His flowing periods were again suspended by a well-dressed gentleman of about thirty years of age, who occupied a seat at the Doctor's right hand, and to the mortification of the latter, took up the conversation——

“Your Lordship is, perhaps, from London?”

“I was there, Sir, about ten days since.”

“So was I, my Lord; did your Lordship see the last new play at Covent Garden?”

“I was not so fortunate, Sir.”

“Nor I, my Lord, but I went the night before I came off to have a squeeze at the pit. And I thought to myself, before I went, that it would be a pity to have all my labour for nothing, after walking so far; so I put on a pair of bran new, clean, white, cotton stockings, that if I could not get in, I might take a walk, as it was a fine day, and come home like a gentleman. But I got my shoes trod down at heel, and my new stockings kicked and mudded all over, and after all was obliged to take a coach."

"That was an unfortunate expedition, Sir!"

"Not altogether, my Lord; for in the crowd I was introduced to as charming a girl as ever you saw with your eyes—she was at Margate in the summer. I often looked at her with a longing eye, but did not dream she had any thing to do with a particular friend of mine. Was you ever at Margate, my Lord?"

"I never was, Sir."

"Glorious place to a man that's fond of fish. I dare say your Lordship will hardly believe it, but in the summer when I went down, in Mr. Deputy Tallow's sailing-boat, with a party of five or six agreeable gentlemen, like myself, we bought some of the finest mackerel at twopence a dozen."

“Astonishing! but I suppose, Sir, as Harrowgate does not possess the advantages of Margate, in the fish line, we are indebted for the pleasure of your company to some more powerful cause?”

“Why, I don’t know, my Lord, and the doctors don’t know. Some say it is the gout, and some will have it is not. They have sent me to Bath, and to the sea, and to this place, and the other place——”

“Then I imagine, Sir, you are in the same doubt about your disease that my friend Falstaff was?”

“I hope your friend is better, my Lord. I should like to take advice from the same doctor. I beg your pardon, my Lord, but if it is not taking too great a liberty, may I request the favour of the gentleman’s name and address?”

“Not in the least, Sir,” said I, as I looked with astonishment in the face of the questioner—"his name, as I before observed, is Falstaff; where he is to be met with at present I cannot inform you; but the last authentic account I had of him was from his lodgings in Eastcheap."

"Eastcheap! thank you, my Lord! I really believe Mr. Falstaff dined at our house last month, as a visitor to the Gatherum club."

"I am truly happy to hear from you, Sir, that a gentleman who has so long delighted the world with his wit and humour is still——"

"Oh yes, my Lord! Mr. Falstaff looked as well as ever I saw him. I remember the club sat very late, and were monstrous merry."

A pause in the conversation again enabled the Doctor to take the lead. The environs of Harrowgate presented, he told me, some delightful rides; he should be happy to accompany me as a guide. If I preferred pedestrianism, which greatly promoted the circulation of the juices, to equestrianism, he was ready to join me. He concluded his offers of service, by telling me that the house afforded some sensible and highly estimable characters, to whom he should be proud to introduce me.

What more could I possibly require?

The Doctor thought that something was still wanting, for he invited himself to breakfast with me the following morning, in my private room, to give me, as he said, an insight into what he plainly perceived was new to me.

I could not do otherwise than express my gratitude for his kind offers, of which I declared my readiness to avail myself.

CHAP. II.WHIST.

At the hour of tea, I accompanied Doctor Bubbleby to the drawing-room, where I saw that an addition had been made to our society by the presence of a tall, lank, weather-beaten West-Indian, about six feet six inches in height, who seemed to have long ceased to hold intercourse with flesh and blood, for he was literally skin and bone; and if his skin was to be taken as a criterion for his origin or occupation, he had been born and bred in a tan-yard. He seemed fast approaching towards seventy. But notwithstanding his age, and spare figure, there was a considerable appearance of buckism to be discovered in his air and gait.

The Doctor commenced his promised civilities, by leading me towards his valued friends Mrs. Dunder and the Miss Sidebottoms. He was proceeding to make me known to the other visitors, but was prevented by Mrs. Dunder, who pre-emptorily claimed my lordship for her whist table. It was in vain I told the good lady that I was a very bad player ; she had known many bad players that were agreeable partners, and delightful adversaries. No excuse would be received ; and I was hurried away at the moment when the passing by of Mrs. Berrington, and her lovely daughter, would have afforded the Doctor an opportunity, which he seemed anxious to seize, of giving me the privilege of addressing them. But my doom was irrevocably fixed.

Before the ceremonies of the whist table were at an end, and before Mrs. Dunder and the Miss Sidebottoms could settle who should have the honour of playing with his Lordship, Mr. Purry, the West Indian, had advanced to the table to establish his claims to the 'previous acquaintance of Mrs. Dunder, with whom he had had the pleasure of passing some pleasant weeks last winter at Bath. She was vastly glad to see him, and lamented that her whist party was completed before she had the honour of recognizing him, knowing how fond he was of a rubber.

I begged to yield my place to a person who was fond of a rubber. But this was not permitted. Miss Euphemia, however, took a serious offence, and begged to decline playing, muttering to herself as she withdrew from the table, that "it would be well for some people if they were a little better acquainted with good breeding." I offered my seat to the angry fair, and pressed her acceptance of it as strenuously, yet as delicately as possible. But to no purpose ; I was an appendage that could not on any account be spared.

On drawing for partners I fell to the lot of Miss Cornelia Sidebottom. The first deal passed off tolerably well. There was a most unconscionable degree of ogling between Mr. Purry and his fair partner, but I should be sorry to have it imagined that I make any accusation of secret collusion. Friends long absent when they again meet may be indulged in certain gesticulations which would not in other cases be allowable. In the course of the rubber, I may perhaps, in my suspicion, have done injustice to both. I remarked that their looks underwent all the changes of ardent lovers. They were sometimes cheerful, sometimes depressed. Sometimes beaming with hope, and at others, tinctured with despair. But whether these transitions were occasioned by love, or the cards, it is impossible for me to say, for the cards at all events were the farthest from my thoughts, and perchance love was the farthest from their's.

In my short pupillage at the London clubs, I had suffered a little for thinking myself a good whist player. I certainly was not a bad one, and if I had been properly classed, I should have been placed on the uppermost side of mediocrity. But I may be allowed to say without vanity that from a long and close practice, I was enabled to shuffle upon the newest and most approved principle, and I was moreover a little proud of the extreme neatness with which I was universally allowed to distribute the cards. The second deal fell to my lot. I had previously excited admiration by my peculiar mode of intermingling the suits, and now prepared to call for fresh applause by my dexterity in dealing. I began in style, and had proceeded with vigour and correctness through about three parts of the pack, when my evil stars placed the elder Miss Berrington behind the chair of my partner. I involuntarily held my hand, and probably should have continued some time motionless, had not Miss Cornelia kindly brought me to my senses by tenderly inquiring if I was ill.

I was instantly aware of my unpardonable negligence, and with evident marks of confusion, redoubled my exertions to make amends for the lost time. Unfortunately, in my hurry to acquit myself with honour and credit, the ace of spades turned up in the irregular regular course to my left hand adversary Mrs. Dunder, who with great exultation congratulated her partner upon their escape. I do not think I ever so completely resembled a fool in appearance. My glowing cheeks let me into the state of my own feelings, and Miss Cornelia's tongue did not conceal the state of hers.

“There,” said the lady, “there's my usual luck. Now I don't expect to win a rubber to-night. It was but yesterday evening that Mr. Solomons did the very same thing, and I lost three bumpers running,”

“Pray, dear madam,” said a little bow-legged jewish looking personage, “pray spare me now. I woe to gad it was an accident.”

“Don't be too harsh, Miss Side-bottom,” cried the cotton stocking gentleman; “Mr. Solomons has done nothing but grieve ever since.”

“I declare, Mr. Block,” said Cornelia to the last speaker, “I do not find fault without reason, Mr. Solomons——.”

“Mercy, mercy, dear madam!” prayed Mr. Solomons, “indeed, dear Miss Sidebottom, I could not sleep a wink last night, and all owing to nothing else but incurring your displeasure.”

“It is no matter,” retorted the angry fair one, “if you never slept again, so you never played at whist. But I beg pardon, my Lord, for my rudeness, but sometimes one gets somehow off one’s guard. However, Miss Berrington, I will thank you not to stick yourself behind my chair, it is quite a pleasure to see my Lord deal, and he dealt every card right till you came, and then he seemed as if he was like one bewitched. I dont like people behind my chair; besides if one is to look any where from one’s hand it should be to one’s partner.”

“Then I must move my station, Miss Sidebottom,” said Mr. Block, who was behind me, "for I am sure you cannot help looking at me."

"Oh dear no!" answered Cornelia, "I did not even know you were there; and if I had, you might have staid till doomsday before I should have wished your removal."

Mr. Block was certainly a handsome featured man, although I think it possible to have carved as much sense and expression out of a turnip, as was exhibited by the contour of his face. I could not, therefore, account for the asperity with which she answered him in any other way than by supposing that he, as well as myself, had had the misfortune to misdeal. Doctor Bubbleby had been absent during the rise and progress of my misfortunes, but he came to my aid when they had reached their height. By some tranquillizing expressions towards Cornelia, he brought her rage to the level of silent grief.

Vexed to the soul at being placed in such a ridiculous situation, I boggled out a train of apologies, and promised amendment. But notwithstanding it was declared unlawful to look from one's hand to any object besides one's partner, I could not help casting an eye upon the blushing Lydia as she retreated from her position. The angry Cornelia made an effort to restrain her temper, and to make herself agreeable. But to little purpose. The natural irascibility of her temper did not easily subside. She wished to forgive me, but it was not in her power.

Possibly if I had committed no more blunders, my pardon might have been sealed, and I might have regained her good opinion. But I was fated to be unfortunate. The first game we were five to four. Miss Cornelia had three honours in her own hand, and I had the fourth. With our cards the game must have been ours to a moral certainty. My attention was, however, unfortunately again caught by the unoffending Lydia, as her graceful figure was moving in a part of the room which my sight could command,—— and I revoked. The result of the deal was that we only reckoned the honours, while our adversaries carried off the merits and profits of the odd trick, and subsequently won the game.

Miss Cornelia here lost sight of common decency. My own disposition which was none of the most placable was roused by her remarks, and had I not been restrained by a certain feeling to which I had hitherto been a stranger, I should have thrown up the cards, complimented my partner with my good wishes to the devil, and instantly left a place in which I had made so ludicrous a figure.

My inattention was the more remarkable, as the rest of the whist party devoted themselves to the intricacies of the game with such intense application, as if their very existence had depended upon the issue. During the whole of the rubber, except when the points were to be scored at the close of a deal, I do not recollect that a word passed from any lips except those of Miss Cornelia in reprobating my bad play, and from my own in excusing it. As to the looks between Mrs. Dunder and Mr. Purry they can be reckoned as nothing, for they might have reference to the game.

To make amends for my bad play, for in spite of myself my eyes were every where wandering in search of Lydia, fortune favoured me with hands which speedily terminated the rubber in our favour. Miss Cornelia placed her winnings in her card purse with considerable satisfaction, and was so pleased with the result, that she proposed giving our opponents their revenge.

I fear my objections to this measure were conveyed in language more forcible than becoming, for on the following morning I overheard Miss Cornelia observing to Mr. Purry, who had just been informing her that when young he had as fine a leg as any man in England, that “Lords were grown so common now adays, she was afraid to spit out of her window, lest she might soil nobility.

CHAP III.

CHIT CHAT.

NO tempest beaten mariner ever experienced greater joys, in avoiding shipwreck, and entering a haven of safety, than I felt in making my escape from the whist table. Mrs. Dunder was sorry to lose me, and even condescendingly offered to take me herself; but I was inflexible, and in defiance of smiles and entreaties left my place to be occupied by Miss Euphemia as a pis aller. Euphemia's techiness had evaporated in great measure by time, and her temper was entirely restored at the first touch of the magic table, to be again lost by bad play or bad luck.

The first use I proposed to make of my liberty was to retreat to my own apartment, but a glimpse of Lydia fixed me to the room. Unwilling to withdraw from the magnet which had so powerfully attracted my regard, and withheld by delicacy, as well as by the fear of becoming intrusive, from endeavouring to engage the Berrington family in discourse without the form of an introduction, I sought for Doctor Bubbleby whom I found engaged in conversation with Mr. Solomons and Mr. Mustard, a Nottingham manufacturer.

I had no sooner approached within hearing than Mr. Solomons, casting his eyes towards his bow legs, "d——d his father for setting him on horseback so early." I was a little surprized that this expression should pass unnoticed by my reverend friend, but I found afterwards that it was Mr. Solomons' constant speech on the first advance of a stranger, to account for those graceful curvatures with which nature had adorned him.

The Nottingham manufacturer had been holding a dissertation upon silk stockings and taper legs. He had just brought his hypothesis to some temper, and had expressed his decided opinion, that nothing so much contributed to the elegance of the female figure as a pair of well designed clocks.

The sudden transition from taper to bow legs, and thence to horsemanship, quite disconcerted the hero of the stocking frame. After a short pause, in which he looked like one who had got rid of his ideas, the lord knows how, he retired from the field. Mr. Solomons in a few moments followed his example, leaving the Doctor, as he expressed himself, perfectly at my service.

The same placid smile still played upon the Doctor's countenance. He lamented the situation in which he had been the unlucky cause of placing me, but to make amends, he led me towards Mrs. Berrington and her daughter, thus giving me a right to pay my devoirs without incurring the charge of intrusion.

I cannot say whether it was the ridiculous light in which I must have appeared to the whole assemblage, or whether my tongue was bound by other causes, but I certainly had lost all command over it. It was with difficulty I stammered out a few common place remarks to the mother, accompanied by some glances towards the daughter.

I was never one of those who pride themselves upon their impudence, nor do I recollect, with this exception, that my conduct would warrant the imputation of over modesty. On this occasion I used every endeavour to rally my spirits, and to acquire my usual freedom of manner, but my attempts were unavailing. Every effort to speak was repressed by a violent throbbing till then unknown to me. My whole frame trembled; I would have given the world to have moved, but was irresistibly rivetted to the spot.

It is fortunate that the inward workings of the mind are not perceptible to their full extent. To a bystander, free from the like sensations, every change of feature is attributed to circumstances within the comprehension of the observer. Thus, while I was suffering an indescribable something between pleasure and pain, my confusion was alleged to have arisen from the severe reprimands of the amiable Miss Cornelia.

The approach of Mr. Mustard to Mrs. Berrington freed me from a considerable portion of my embarrassment, by engaging the latter in conversation, with Lydia, her sister, and myself as listeners. Mr. Mustard prefaced his discourse by asking if Mrs. Berrington had not lately been at Scarborough. On being answered in the affirmative, he then enquired if she had seen there, an elderly gentleman bearing the name of Popkin.

Mrs. Berrington repeated the name of Popkin two or three times to herself, and then wished to know if Mr. Popkin had lost his right eye.

“The same, madam. Pray is the blue tinge gone off?”

“Blue tinge, Sir!”

“Yes ma’am. But that you may know the reason of my asking, I will just mention the circumstance. Mr. Popkin the elder, till within the last three or four years, resided at his country house about four miles from

Nottingham, called Pop Hall. The old gentleman was a great advocate for the cold bath, and had constructed one at a considerable expence, which he constantly used both summer and winter. But about three or four years back, at the death of the elder Mrs. Popkin, the old gentleman gave up Pop Hall to his son, and commenced his travels in search of amusement, as an antidote to grief. About two months ago, the old gentleman came to Pop Hall upon a visit to his son, just as the latter had completed a dye house upon the scite of the former cold bath. Young Mr. Popkin had not apprized his father of the alteration, consequently the old gentleman proceeded as usual to his morning's occupation. On entering the new dye house, the old gentleman, whose one eye is none of the best, perceiving that his single bath had spread as he thought into several smaller ones exclaimed, aye now, this is something like comfort, every man his own bath. Without further ceremony, he threw off his gown and plunged into an indigo vat. The noise summoned the workmen to the spot, and in a few moments the old gentleman was lugged out, a superfine dark blue."

"But Sir," said Mrs. Berrington smiling, "such a thing must have been the old gentleman's death."

"Oh no ma'am, the ingredients were very harmless, they only bid defiance to soap and water. Mr. Popkin had only a blue skin in every gradation of colour, till nature reprovided him with a white one. I was only anxious to know, if the blue had entirely disappeared, for the last time I saw him he was of the same cerulean tint that we used to give to our stockings."

Doctor Bubbleby had been an auditor during a great part of the Popkin story, and took the place of the relator when it was finished. By his cheerful demeanour he attracted the general observation to himself, giving me the opportunity to gaze in silence without being remarked. I had previously set the Doctor down in my own mind as a superficial trifler, but I now considered him as a being of a superior order. His stepping in, I judged to have proceeded from a desire on his part to spare me a further display of those feelings, of which he "good easy man," had in all probability never dreamt. However, like the other part of his hearers, I was amused with his quibbles and conundrums. Like the rest, I laughed I knew not why, and waited with impatience for the next sally from his inexhaustible store of wit and humour. Perhaps I only appeared to listen; at all events, I do not remember a single word he uttered.

Conversation became general at one end of the room, while the important business of the whist table occupied other. The two Miss Sidebottoms were linked together, and their play having arrived at their own ideas of perfection, no fault was found with any thing but the cards. The West Ingies and the nagers were apparently banished from the mind of Mr. Purry. Secure from hurricanes, freed from a scorching sun, and opposite to Mrs. Dunder, how was it possible for him to be any thing but happy. As to Mrs. Dunder herself, she was occupied with preventing the use of private signals between the enemy.

“I understand you, Miss Sidebottom, but there is no occasion to tell your sister, with your four fingers, that you have four trumps; the fore finger to the tip of the nose for the ace of spade, and to the left ear for the ace of diamonds—sniffing when you want trumps to be led. You see, ma’am, it won’t do, for some people are as wise as other people.—Miss Euphemia, I will thank you to wink at your sister between the deals, and not with the cards in your hand.”

“ I declare, Mrs. Dunder,” said Cornelia, “ you are quite gross and insulting. What an unhappy thing it is Mr. Purry, when people cannot keep their temper at cards—I am always cool.”

“ Keep my temper, Madam,” cried Mrs. Dunder, reddening with rage, and looking vengeance, “ keep my temper, quotha! keep my temper when I see myself cheated——”

“ Cheated, madam!” roared out both sisters at the same moment.

Mr. Purry was now in danger of suffering by the coming storm, for Mrs. Dunder seemed strongly inclined to upset the table. He exerted himself with “ pray Mrs. Dunder,” “ pray Miss Sidebottom.”—“ it is all a mistake ladies ——”

“ Mistake !” said Cornelia, “ to be accused of cheating !”

“ But, my dear Miss Sidebottom,” continued Mr. Purry, “ all that Mrs. Dunder meant was, that when people did make use of unfair practices, it was cheating.”

“ Oh !” rejoined Cornelia, happy in an explanation that kept her honour safe, “ is that all ?—”

“ Nothing else, my dear madam, believe me,” added the West Indian, with a look of affection to Cornelia, and another to Mrs. Dunder. He then reminded the latter that the cards were with her. Mrs. Dunder took the hint, and the confusion in “ Agramontes’ camp” was dispelled.

While this dispute was raging, Mr. Block was seated behind my chair, and by the side of my grunting friend, who proved to be Mr. Ling, an eminent Billingsgate wholesale fish merchant, and a common-councilman. Mr. Block was expatiating upon the extraordinary merits of some ox-tail soup, which he declared, next to turtle, to be the finest thing that was ever tasted. Mr. Ling listened with the greatest attention—his eyes glistening with delight; and, to make use of a vulgar expression, his chops watering. At the close of Mr. Block's speech, he expressed his determination of calling at Mr. Block's to taste some, the instant he got back to town.

The Doctor was occasionally obliged to give a short respite to his lungs. A contest for the rostrum then took place between Mr. Solomons and Mr. Mustard, both of whom had insensibly drawn their chairs towards our circle. As each could gain a hearing, stocks or stockings were the order of the day.

The two Miss Berringtons occasionally interchanged a whisper, which was sometimes followed by mutual smiles, and generally by a rebuking look from their mother, who sat next to them. I could not help thinking myself to be the subject of their mirth. There is a certain degree of touchiness, if there is such a word; if not, the meaning is plain enough to those who have felt it—and as to the rest of the world it is no matter—A certain degree of touchiness, I say, (for techiness does not convey the idea,) is allowable to all those who have unhappily come within the range of Cupid's arrows.

I was pleased with gazing on Lydia, while I fancied that my pleasure arose from the sprightly conversation of the Doctor and his associates. I was in the situation of Rasselas—I had something to desire, and I was happy. For a time I forgot my former follies—forgot myself, except to remember that I was in the company of Lydia Berrington, for whom alone I had eyes to see, and ears to hear. I compared her with the celebrated beauties of the higher circles ; and it is needless to say, that the scale preponderated in favour of Lydia. I had seen, I could not help allowing, many lovely women among the nobility, but my heart had remained in my possession, without having been even in danger. Unmarried females of fashion always appeared to me in the light of rare toys exposed for sale, with the notification of ne touchez pas! In the crowded assemblies, every feature seemed constrained ; the eyes were every where wandering in search of admiration, or firing with rage at the approach of a rival beauty. Every look had the appearance of design, and every motion the air of premeditation.

But Lydia, who was “ when unadorned, adorned the most,” and whose lovely form moved free and unembarrassed, was pleasing from her natural charms, without intention. She was graceful in her movements, benign in her countenance, and in her heart, I could have sworn for it, free from taint. I had before experienced the torments of desire, but I never before had laboured under the influence of that passion, which covets while it dreads—respects while it adores.

Since this period, my heart and head have undergone some painful revolutions. My remembrance is, however, perfect, and my pen obeys the dictates of a heart chilled by disappointment, but momentarily warmed with recalling past scenes of fleeting happiness.

It is almost unnecessary for me to say, that I was in love. It would be branding the reader with stupidity, if I seriously considered such a declaration at all necessary. The drawing-room of a boarding-house contained every thing that I then held valuable in the world. I pictured to myself Lydia and a cottage, and I compared that with Lydia and Bingwood. I then carried my ideas to the pride I should feel in producing her hereafter to the world as Countess of Erpingham. In my castle-building I would have sacrificed my father, and a whole hecatomb into the bargain.

I now discovered that Harrowgate was one of the sweetest spots on the face of the globe. The company was delightful ; and I considered that unhappiness could never enter the walls of a boarding-house.

The hour of rest approached. I retired to my apartment with regret, and longed for the hour which should replace me in such charming society. For somehow or other, like the camel who, taught to dance upon a hot plate to the sound of a pipe, repeats his exertions whenever the music plays, I had associated the company with the delightful feelings I experienced, and looked towards all the party with the same eye of kindness and regard. The sensations were completely new to me, and I could not as yet exactly see from what they had taken their rise. Unlike my uncle Toby, I had no friendly blister, which, by breaking, could determine the point.

CHAP. IV

BREAKFAST.

MY night was passed in a pleasing perturbation, and my dreams, waking as well as sleeping, tended to encourage the pleasing hopes I had already ventured to entertain. In the morning I rose, if possible, more enamoured than I was on the preceding evening, and I longed, with eager expectation for the hour when the company usually assembled. Time never appeared to hang so heavy upon my hands.

With the feelings of a man, whose happiness was at stake, I revolved in my mind the course I should adopt; for, having obtained my own consent, I did not contemplate a refusal on the part of Lydia. To determine upon a point is always half way towards accomplishing it. My own heart was in the possession of Lydia Berrington; hers, in exchange, was next to a certainty, for I was fixed upon obtaining it. The means were before me. I could repeat the libels of Ovid, but none of them in this case were applicable. I esteemed Lydia, and could not flatter her. I loved her with a pure affection, and nothing but a pure affection could satisfy me in return. My prospects in life would gain me attention, and I wanted nothing more; for I was romantic enough to believe, that love was independent of wealth, and that Lydia was above the allurements of grandeur.

My reflections were suspended by the entrance of Doctor Bubbleby, who was punctual to his appointment. His self-invitation had wholly escaped my memory, but I received him with a politeness mingled with satisfaction. I could talk of Lydia, and thus wile away the moments until I could see her. I now discovered the Doctor to be a man of great discernment, for he praised the Berrington family in general, and Miss Lydia Berrington in particular, who, he observed, had judgment and stability beyond her years. Their mental, no less than their personal accomplishments, were considerable. During his intercourse with them they had developed proofs of a cultivated understanding, joined to an exquisite taste. Their taste, I willingly acknowledged, as I chose to fancy that they had received me in a different manner from that in which they treated the rest of the company. All this I placed to the score of personal merit, and not an atom to the due observation of decorum, or the consideration of my rank. In the course of the breakfast, I smiled at the doctor's puns, and laughed at his jokes. Before the close of the meal I perfectly agreed with Miss Sidebottom, that "he was an uncommon pleasant man."

The doctor informed me that Mrs. Berrington was the wife of the Admiral of that name, who was at present on duty in the West Indies; and that her family consisted of these two daughters with a son at Harrow school, for whom she was exerting herself to procure a commission in the army.

Here was a happy excuse for me to interest myself in the affairs of the family, and thus secure the good opinion of the mother. I had no doubt that through some channel or other I should succeed in favour of the youth.

Their income he understood, was not large, and they appeared to have no fixed place of residence; but took up their temporary abode wherever fancy led them. He said they passed the summer at Scarborough, and proposed to spend the winter and spring at Bath.

The doctor proceeded to give me the history of the other personages in the house, to which I listened with a sort of fretful impatience, heeding very little what he was saying. But giving him full credit for his intention to afford me amusement, I suffered him to close his narrative with little interruption. Mrs. Dunder I have already said was the widow of the Dean of ———, but I did not mention that she had a very handsome annuity which enabled her to do as she pleased. Her pleasure consisted in vanity, and she took especial care to indulge it, for as the proverb expresses it, she was here, there, and every where;—an admirer of of gentility, an adorer of nobility when ever it came within her reach, and a complete devotee to whist. Miss Cornelia and Miss Euphemia Sidebottom were the co-heiresses of Mr. Anthony Sidebottom, who had formerly been the proprietor of an eminent sheep's head and tripe shop in Leather Lane. Mr. Sidebottom had retired from business with a sum that satisfied his desires, to enjoy the otium cum dignitate at the place which the co-heiresses still denominated their principal residence.

To my enquiry respecting Mr. Block, I was informed that he was the proprietor of the Hawk tavern in St. Paul's Church Yard, and that if he was not a "fellow of infinite fancy," he was a man of exquisite taste. The Hawk, the doctor told me, was the most celebrated tavern in the city, and that it had been brought into notice solely by the talents and abilities of Mr. Block, who was supposed to have the finest palate in England.

“Then I imagine, doctor, that he lives by taste, and exists by tasting, for I did not perceive at dinner that his appetite was proportioned to his bulk.”

“Very good, my Lord! You are a wit I see—taste and tasting—now I would have given a great deal for that——”

“It is perfectly at your service, doctor——”

“Thank you, my Lord, I hope I shall prove myself grateful. Mr. Block has told me that they can send up dinners as high as seven guineas a head.”

“And provide of course a corresponding digestion. But I imagine gluttony has its bane like all the rest of the grosser passions.”

“Gluttony, however, my Lord, affords Mr. Block an immense income.”

“A part of which, as I apprehend he is continually going to the flesh and fish market, would not be misapplied if he extended his tour and became a purchaser in the brain market."

The doctor exercised his descriptive powers upon the remainder of the company, most of whom had nothing but their nothingness to recommend them. But as listeners are to the full as necessary as speakers, I dare say they had their uses, although I had not penetration enough to discover it.

Great part of the morning was thus consumed before the doctor did me the favour of taking his leave. The day was delightful, and I anticipated the felicity of being the attendant of the Berrington family in their morning's walk. I put myself under the hands of Giles, and had scarcely proceeded half way in adorning myself to the best advantage, when I perceived from my window the fair objects of my solicitude issuing from the door of the hotel, apparently equipped for their ramble, and officiously attended by Mr. Block.

The remainder of my toilet was soon dispatched, but not without considerable reproaches to Giles for the tardiness of his operations.

At length I sallied forth, and pursued with eager haste the road which the ladies had taken. After enquiring of every person I met, I succeeded in overtaking them, as in compliment to Mr. Block's slow movements they had proceeded at an easy pace. According to established usage, the mutual health formed the first consideration. To this, the state of the weather naturally succeeded. But for the latter subject an Englishman might almost as well be dumb. The weather led to the walk, and thus one subject followed close at the heels of another, somewhat to the exclusion of the man of taste's colloquial powers, the course of his thoughts being confined to the indulgence of appetite and the consequences of repletion. If he possessed an idea at all, it was in the form of a made dish. Talk of fricassees and Mr. Block was learned,—talk of ragouts, he was fluent,—on oxtail soup he was eloquent, but on every other subject mute. The ladies proposed to extend their walk to a distance which did not accord with Mr. Block's notion of pleasure, and he kindly left us.

From Mrs. Berrington my reception was one of marked attention, nor was there any thing repulsive in the behaviour of her daughter. The mother sometimes loitered behind, and often called back her youngest daughter, either to admire the scenery or to adjust some part of her dress. Happy as I felt myself in the moments I was alone with Lydia, my tongue still failed of its office at the departure of her sister, and I only regained the use of it when she returned. Before the conclusion of the walk I had been acquainted with the whole family for seven years.

My misfortunes at the whist table had completely separated me from the card party, I could therefore, without the chance of giving offence, pursue my inclination and join the evening circle which usually surrounded Mrs. Berrington. Of the four which composed Mrs. Dunder's table, Miss Euphemia Sidebottom was the only one who treated me with even common politeness. With Mrs. Dunder I had been guilty of enlisting under other banners. With Miss Cornelia I was unpardonable, having slighted her requests, and with Mr. Purry I was less than nobody, for I was not only a lord, but I exposed myself to the anger of his dear friend, whose cause he warmly defended. Miss Euphemia was however, kindness itself, for on my endeavouring one evening to tempt Lydia to seat herself beside me in my phaeton for the purpose of viewing Studley park, Miss Euphemia kindly offered herself, alledging that she knew every step of the road, whereas Miss Berrington must be totally ignorant of it. My gratitude to Miss Euphemia was obliged to be confined to thanks. But although Lydia refused to accompany me alone, she did not object to my proposal of hiring a sociable and using my own horses. We thus contrived to pass many pleasant hours apart from observation.

In the evenings Dr. Bubbleby wandered in all directions, pleasing every one by the urbanity of his temper. As to myself, I was occupied by intervals of thought and absence. I was either "sucking in poison both at eyes and ears," or else planning schemes of future felicity.—Ruminating on the various modes which suggested themselves to my imagination, for gaining the affections of Lydia, or plunging deeper and deeper in an ocean of love.

Ten days elapsed during which nothing remarkable happened to me beyond what usually occurs to all others who are similarly circumstanced. My mind was absorbed in the contemplation of one object, and the rest of the world might have been destroyed without its exciting any extraordinary degree of interest in my breast. As our intimacy increased, the opportunities for discourse became more frequent. My constant attention to Lydia ceased to excite notice, for although I had never exceeded the bounds of respectful regard, the state of my heart must have been as well known to every other person as to myself. There was a certain degree of hauteur about Mrs. Berrington which preserved us from idle remark, and I had held no communication with any other part of the company, that could entitle them to the freedom of familiar conversation. With the exception of Dr. Bubbleby, who usually did me the honour of breakfasting in my room, my communications were almost entirely confined to the Ber-ringtons.

CHAP. IV.

HONI SOIT QUI MAL Y PENSE.

ALTHOUGH I said towards the close of the last chapter, that nothing remarkable had happened to me during my stay at Harrowgate, out of the common road, there were, however, two incidents which in my opinion ought not to be omitted. I have professed to give only "Some Account of Myself," and therefore may, if I choose it, only insert those occurrences which redound to my honour. But the fact is, that I have not the talents for invention, and my memory has been somewhat treacherous on many occasions. I dare say that I am guilty of sometimes giving too much weight to a trivial action, which hardly deserved to be noticed at all, and at other times I may neglect to insert essential transactions in their proper places. These blemishes in the narration, I can positively assert do not arise from any intention of concealing the truth, but are to be ascribed solely to a want of a proper arrangement of my materials. I have frequently noticed omissions which have come across my mind after the opportunity of relating them has passed completely by. This I regret for two reasons. First, because I myself, must pass them in silence; and secondly because the world will thereby be deprived of the proper means of doing justice to my character. All I can say is, that I must be considered as representing myself in mezzo rilievo, or perhaps in alto rilievo, and that my opinions and conduct, character and behaviour, under circumstances which I cannot relate in their natural order, are to be allowed to correspond with the prominent features. I hope, at all events, that I shall write with sufficient explicitness of my own character, to enable the reader to fancy how I should act on occasions, which he may think necessary to connect the chain of my life, and I hereby empower him to fill up the blanks accordingly.

On the fourth day of my arrival at Harrowgate, I was informed of the decease of the Reverend Robert Farren, the worthy rector of Bingwood. The living was in my gift, and was worth, on a moderate computation, about six hundred a year. At the same time I also received a letter from the bishop of the diocese, strongly recommending the son of Mr. Farren, to be his father's successor. In consequence of the father's very infirm state of health, young Farren had, for the last six years, performed the duties of the living, to the satisfaction of the parishioners and his own credit. He had moreover been led to expect the living at his father's death; not by any positive promise on my part, but by a tacit understanding.

In the warmth of my heart towards my new friends, I had already settled Lydia at Bingwood, and now thought what delightful amusement Dr. Bubbleby would afford us in the long winter evenings, when fatigued with the sports of the field, I returned to the enjoyment of our fire side. I fancied two or three little cherubs rolling on the rug before the fire, archly smiling in my face as they untied the doctor's shoestrings—I—. In short I made the doctor an offer of the living and it is needless to say that he accepted it. The presentation was immediately made out, and the Reverend Theophilus Bubbleby became the rector of Bingwood. By this, the well founded expectations of an estimable man were destroyed,—a living of considerable value conferred upon a hypocritical coxcomb, and the mind of the patron indelibly stained with regret.

The other circumstance which is equally strong in my remembrance, was of a very different description. Not satisfied with enjoying the society of Lydia Berrington during eight hours of the day, I made a thousand excuses to visit my bed room, at the time allotted by her the duties of the toilet, that I might pass by the door of the chamber which contained her.

What I am going to relate is directed only to lovers. The rest of my readers I would strenuously advise for their own sakes as well as mine, to skip on to the next chapter. None but a lover can feel a lover's pangs,—none but a lover can feel a lover's pleasures. As to love itself, I verily believe that during the whole time in which a man is "sighing like a furnace," and penning or imagining sonnets to "his mistress's eye brow," he is no more like his real self than he is "to Hercules." Sleep, Sancho observes, "covers a man all over like a cloak;" Love, on the contrary is not a much better covering than a jacket, which, when well buttoned keeps the body, that is, the heart warm, and leaves the seat of reason exposed to the raging tempest. It is for this reason that a man in love is so fidgetty; his jerkin in general sits too tight upon him, and allows him to move in one direction only. No wonder it is so uncomfortable, and the jacket once cast off, that the wearer should be in no hurry to provide himself with another.

But to my story.—One morning I saw Lydia flying along the gallery in a dishabille. She hastily entered the bed room, and having as I imagined caught a glympse of my figure, closed the door with more than ordinary violence. I followed immediately, and perceived on the floor a something which bore evident marks of having been applied to the suspension of a stocking. Not doubting that it was one of Lydia's garters, which being lightly fastened on had dropped in her haste, I seized it with the greatest avidity, and pressed it again and again with fervency to my lips. I examined it in the light, and was rather surprized at finding it consisted of a piece of wide tape, and that whether it had laboured under the influence of hydrophobia or not, it certainly had not enjoyed the luxury of the washing tub for a very considerable period. But this made no difference. The manners peculiar I believe to Harrowgate and Cheltenham had reconciled me to many circumstances at which my mind would previously have recoiled ; a great part of my false delicacy had therefore vanished. Besides, I thought that it had encircled the leg of my fair one and that was every thing to me.

I carefully folded the precious relic, deposited a kiss upon every fold, attached it to a black ribbon and suspended it round my neck directly on my heart. I felt delighted with my treasure, and when in our morning's ramble the hand of Lydia was gently drawn within my left arm, while her mother did the same to my right, the sensation was doubly grateful, for it was her hand which pressed her garter closer to my breast.

I know not how long I might have continued in the use of this appendage had not the dinner time taught me to estimate its value. Elevated by my acquisition I gave vent to an unusual flow of spirits, which I seemed to have communicated to those around me. Even Mr. Ling was exhilarated into speech, and full of philanthropy, recommended me to try some rabbit smothered in onions, notwithstanding, he was eating from the dish, and apparently enjoying it, and what was still more remarkable, there was very little left, not more I dare say than he himself could devour. Mr. Block too for a moment forgot his taste, and philosophized upon early propensities. He told us that the great delight of his elder brother Mr. Toby Block when a child was to scour a copper teakettle, which had been blackened by smoke.

But a few words from the upper end of the table put all my pleasureable ideas to flight. Mrs. Dunder mentioned, as a most extraordinary circumstance, that she had that morning dropped her garter in the gallery somewhere near Miss Berrington's door, as she thought, and although she had immediately returned to seek it, and had made every possible enquiry, her efforts to recover it were unavailing. What was more astonishing, the good lady observed, there had been no person in the passage but my Lord Winterbourne.

This was almost too much. But the reader, particularly if he has ever been in love, can better figure to himself my sensations at this horrible discovery than I can describe them. My brain turned giddy, and I felt a faintness come over me, accompanied by a loathing sickness. My eyes involuntarily fixed upon Mrs. Dunder, while a combination of disgusting ideas crowded on my mind. Every thing I put into my mouth tasted of Mrs. Dunder; the wine smelt of Mrs. Dunder, and the name of Dunder was continually ringing in my ears. The thoughts of the caresses, which I had so ardently bestowed upon the dirty tape occasioned a nausea from which I could not rid myself so long as the now hated garter continued attached to my person. To remove from the table I conceived would betray me, especially as Mrs. Dunder had made an allusion to my name in the transaction. Thus "conscience makes cowards of us all," and the dirty tape remained against my beating heart, which seemed by its thumps to reproach me for the neighbour I had given it. There was nothing left for me but patience, and to that I reluctantly submitted, staying at the table rather longer than my usual time, lest I might be supposed to have had any secret motive for hurrying away.

My only consolation in this unfortunate affair, was that the knowledge was confined to my own breast; for although Mrs Dunder had made use of my name, there was nothing in her manner which led me to suppose that she suspected me of the theft. Lovers I know will pity me, however, much the world may laugh at me. But I will venture to assert, that to those suffering under the influence of the tender passion, the garter of the beloved object, is as much, if not more, to be prized than any other article of female apparel; and I appeal to the public in general to judge between the supposed garter of Lydia Berrington, in case it had been bona fide her property, and no one's else's, the pattern string of Lady Mary Ruffer, so eloquently eulogized, with the high price of bread, by the Marquis of Gander;—and the dirty white leather glove of Mrs. Brownston which was so lovingly devoured by Lord Edgeborough.

~~SEPARATION.~~

CHAP. VI.

SEPARATION.

THE time which Mrs. Berrington had allotted for her stay at Harrogate passed rapidly away, and the day of departure was on the eve of commencing, before I had dreamt of separation. My love had almost got the better of my assumed prudence, and I was on the point of making a declaration to the mother in form. But two reasons restrained me. Not that I had the most distant idea of swerving from my purpose, for to have contemplated Lydia Berrington in any other light than as my my future bride would have been distraction. The unfortunate issue, however, of my hastily formed attachment to Villiers, was not yet effaced from my memory, and as yet I did not feel satisfied that I had made such a progress in the affections of Lydia, as would put a refusal on her part beyond a doubt. A denial, or even a pretext for delay would have wounded my pride, and my experience in the world at that time was not sufficient to point out to me the cruelty of thus sporting with the feelings of an amiable woman.

It is not a matter of wonder that females should resort to tricks and contrivances, and revel in the power which they have obtained. It is the only way in which they can place themselves upon a level with the other sex. Coquetry in a man is by no means a greater rarity than it is in a woman, although imperious custom which exposes it in a female to merited contempt, casts a shade over similar conduct on the part of a man. The fluttering heart of the unexperienced girl will oftentimes get entangled before she is aware of her danger, and the fluttering coxcomb who has buzzed about and treated her with marked attention, wonders that the poor thing should so mistake a little common civility. The sentimental hero by dint of perseverance frequently gains the regard and confidence of a woman, and then protests that his friendship was purely platonic. Men, I cannot, will not call them, they are monsters who combine the venom of the viper with the tricks and malice of the monkey. Every woman must feel gratified with individual attention, and circumscribed as are her powers by the received maxims of society, a man has no right to engross the monopoly of that which he does not mean ultimately to possess.

Mrs. Berrington had frequently entertained me with recounting the estimable qualities of her eldest daughter. I fully acknowledged them. My conduct towards Lydia, although I had not made any declaration, was far from equivocal. I always treated her with that respectful homage which can only spring from a pure and ardent passion. It was of a nature which declared my sentiments, while it disarmed suspicion. I was above deception, and Lydia disdained to resort to those petty arts, which though strictly justifiable, are beneath a woman who feels a confidence in herself, and in her own powers of pleasing. The common trick of exciting jealousy, in order to produce an eclaircissement could not here be employed, for it chanced that there was no person at that time at Harrowgate, capable of being played off as a foil. Mr. Solomons was himself alone. Mr. Block, indeed, was a bachelor, but Lydia was not of a disposition to be desirous of shining at the bar, or of carrying in the first dish. Indeed, had it been attempted it must inevitably have failed, for my innate pride would have placed me superior to it, particularly as it was supported by the consciousness of a handsome person, and the weight of considerable rank.

The moment of parting arrived. I handed the ladies into their chaise, Lydia was the last. I pressed her hand to my lips, and for the first time imprinted upon it a fervent kiss. This was accompanied with a gentle squeeze which I felt, or thought I felt was slightly returned. Our eyes met, and a blush was perceptible upon her cheeks. The hands of the three ladies touched their faces; they were then waved to the company generally. The post boys cracked their whips. The chaise drove rapidly off, and with it — my heart.

To the idler whose only object is to dissipate time; it is of little importance to what place his steps are directed. Bath when it contained Lydia Berrington, had as many and as powerful charms for me as Harrowgate had so lately possessed. To Bath without hesitation I resolved to go.

Mrs. Berrington had proposed to be in Bath in about a fortnight from her departure from] Harrowgate. Part of the intervening space was to be spent with the admiral's relations, who resided in the neighbourhood of Worcester. I recollected having heard of the beauties of Worcestershire, and determined to take it in my route. But the house my new friends were going to, stood, they informed me, by itself, and there did not appear any likelihood of my being indulged with personal intercourse; unless I choose to appear in the character of Lydia's avowed lover. My desire of seeing Worcestershire speedily evaporated. It was the beauty in, and not of the county which I was anxious to inspect.

My only resource was now in Doctor Bubbleby. Harrowgate became hateful to me. Mrs. Dunder expressed her opinion to Miss Sidebottom that they should not long have my Lord's company now Miss Berrington was gone. The spinster in answer, observed that I must be dreadfully deficient in taste, by the decided preference I had given to a green girl. Every man, she added, of judgment, and who knows what's what, would glory in mature charms. I was, however, kept in countenance by Mr. Block, who declared she was a nice girl, and that he should like just such a one for a wife, in case she could play the piano, and sing a little. I was offended at nothing but the term girl, for Lydia Berrington was a lovely and angelic woman.

Every thing at the boarding house reminded me of what I was now deprived of. To remain longer would have been irksome to a degree, and where was I to go to for the next fourteen days. As the thought of the moment I proposed to Dr. Bubbleby that he should accompany me to Bingwood, and take possession of his new living. It was with some difficulty he prevailed upon me to wait till the following morning. Like a school-boy looking to the approaching holidays, I counted the hours and minutes that must necessarily elapse before I could again feel happy. The evening, I passed in my own room, and the greater part of it alone, Mrs. Dunder having commanded the doctor's presence upon some especial occasion. At night I thought of nothing but overturns, and other mishaps in travelling; and I once in the night alarmed the whole house by a cry of fire, having dreamed that the inn which contained my Lydia was in flames.

Contrary to what is generally experienced, the month of November proved remarkably fine. Had it been as gloomy and as foggy as usual, I would scarcely have answered for myself. I rose as soon as it was light and prepared for my departure. Breakfast and the settlement of accounts were soon dispatched, and we ascended the phæton, as the clock struck ten. On the evening of the following day we reached Bingwood. My companion had exerted his colloquial powers to the utmost, for my amusement on the road; but my thoughts were too fully occupied to listen to any thing that did not relate to the Berrington's. The doctor at last guessed the state of my feelings, and rung the changes upon Lydia's name so often that every one but a lover must have been sick and tired.

On the following morning we proceeded to the parsonage. Mrs. Larren and her family still remained there. George, the good old lady said, was nearly heart broken; he had hoped his father's family would have been considered. But they bowed with resignation to the will of providence. George would be happy to continue the curacy, at least till they could decide upon their future plans.

Dr. Bubbleby kindly assured the widow how much he felt for her situation, and that of her family. It would highly gratify him to oblige her in any thing, but he had appointed a highly valued friend to the curacy, whom he expected would want to have possession of the parsonage house in the early part of the ensuing week.

I could scarcely repress my rising indignation on hearing this. I inwardly cursed myself for the folly and precipitancy of my conduct, in placing such worthy people in the power of a cold blooded fawning wretch. I muttered out some offers of services to the widow and hastily withdrew.

The opinion which I now entertained of the Doctor was further confirmed on our return home, by his telling me that the parsonage house was a disgrace to such a living; and that it would require an expenditure of a thousand pounds and upwards to put it into decent repair. He was sorry for Mrs. Farren, but he felt himself under the necessity of immediately suing Mr. Farren's representatives for dilapidations, which were very considerable.

I positively felt contempt and abhorrence for the Doctor, when on entering the house, it was announced that a gentleman was waiting for Doctor Bubbleby, whom he presented to me as Mr. Compass, one of the most eminent tithe surveyors in Yorkshire, and for whom he had sent to take an immediate survey of the parish, with a view of raising the tithes, which were worth, the doctor told me, at least double the amount at present paid for them.

“ Few of my cloth, my Lord,” added he, “ can boast of having paid a more indefatigable attention to the interests of the church than myself. It is a duty to which I see my predecessor has been lamentably deficient. Popularity so gained, at the expence of reason and justice, is a positive vice, of which every trace should be removed as soon as possible.”

I could make no answer—I considered myself in the light of a criminal. My tenants, whose forefathers had lived on my property, I had set at the mercy of a wolf in sheep’s clothing. I saw myself again deceived by my hastiness, and unlike all former cases, I was now the least sufferer.

My mind was satisfied in some degree by the determination which I formed of providing for the family of poor Farren, and of defending them from the rapacity of the new rector. But, to my eternal shame, do I now acknowledge, that they never had any other provision or defence at my hands than promises—and neglect.

Bingwood instantly became as hateful to me, as Harrowgate was when I left it. I hoped that the leave I took of the Doctor would be a final one, and that I should never again be reminded of my weakness by the sight of him.

I hurried to the metropolis, and endeavoured to occupy my mind with its gaieties. But they all failed in exciting the least share of attention. My thinking faculties were alternately occupied with love and folly—with Lydia Berrington and Doctor Bubbleby. The former at last gained the entire ascendancy; and, notwithstanding some days were wanting of the appointed time, I set out for Bath.

CHAP. VII.

DECLARATION.

MY journey was conducted with my usual impatience, and as luck would have it, I had only one overturn upon the road, which, considering that I was every quarter of an hour hurrying the post-boys, was as little as could be reasonably expected. About midway between Reading and Newbury, the chaise was upset by coming in contact with a waggon, with such violence, as completely to wrench off the hind wheel, at the expence of a broken axletree. To proceed, for the present, was impossible ; and, by way of amusing the time, while another chaise was sent for, I alternately railed at the post-boys for their carelessness, and at myself for my impetuosity.

A man particularly eager for arriving at a destined point, who travels in the quickest way which circumstances can afford, even if it is in a broad-wheeled waggon, is comparatively satisfied. He is, at all events, advancing towards the goal, however slowly. Whereas, by standing still, as an Irishman would say, he is not moving at all. Rather than have awaited the coming of the chaise, I believe that I should have taken a seat even in a dung-cart, if it was but proceeding in a western direction. A stage coach was a much pleasanter vehicle; and there being an inside place vacant in one which was passing by, I paid the post-boys liberally, told Giles to shift my luggage, and to seat himself upon the roof. I then mounted the step, and in an instant found myself tight jammed in the middle seat, between two carcasses of extraordinary rotundity, both of whom were wrapped up so completely in great coats, that had not one of their heads been decorated with a bonnet, and the other with a hat, their genders might have been doubtful. The fumes of Geneva issued from under the bonnet, and those of rum from the hat, to neither of which I ever entertained any vast affection, particularly at second hand.

A strict silence was for a few minutes observed, during which I glanced my eyes upon the three opposite passengers; but as they were equally provided against the cold, I could see little more of them than that they were two men and a woman, the latter in the middle, and apparently young. I then cast my eyes to my own person, as well as the cramped position in which I was placed permitted me, beginning with the upper part of my waistcoat, and proceeding downwards. I began to entertain doubts of my identity, and debated, in my own mind, whether the I in the stage-coach was the self same I that had been the purchaser of my Lord Sniperhead's magnificent house in Grosvenor Square, and had sacrificed so much to style and fashion.

The conversation, which was suspended by my entrance, was soon resumed by my right hand friend in the hat addressing a consequential gentleman opposite with——

“ Well, zur, yous were a zaying summut about the ley——”

“ Yes, Sir,” returned the gentleman, “ your neighbour, my Lord Squash, carried the day hollow. Indeed, it was impossible to be otherwise. His Lordship had justice on his side, an upright judge, and, I flatter myself, an attorney of no common abilities.”

“ Then measter Gammon’s lease is good for noughts ?”

“ Not worth a doit ! not worth the parchment it is written on ; for seeing, as must be evident to every man of common sense, that his Lordship was heir under strict entail——”

“ Tail ! why dang it, measter Lawyer, we always tho’t, about our place, that Lord Squash was the head, as a body might say.”

“ So he is, my good friend. He is the head of his family ; a noble family too, let me tell you—none of your upstarts. If any man richly deserves to be at the head of his country, it is my Lord Squash. Such liberal ideas—such confidence in his advisers——”

“ Whoy, a sneaking son of a b——h ! didn’t he zend Giles Cribb to gaol, only ’cause a heare ware vound dead in the vield vhare Goiles were passing ? And a’nt poor Goiles’s vamily starving ?”

“ Why, my Lord is a little strict about his game ; perhaps too strict——”

My neighbour, in the bonnet, now entered into a long disquisition upon the game laws. They were, she said, a scandal upon the country. “ ‘To go for to think that a respectable person ca’nt relish a hare or a partridge, because they are not qualified to eat them——”

“ You mistake the matter entirely,” said the lawyer. “ If you will allow me to give you a little idea of the game laws, I shall soon, I am satisfied, convince you, not only of their propriety, but of their being strictly consonant to justice.”

“ Justice! a fiddlestick !” said the dame.

“ Meayhap, Measter Lawyer, that’s Lunnun justice, whare they’ve a gige ; as to we poor country folk, we be fobbed off wie some of them thear serjeant fellows at our zize.”

The lawyer then continued his dissertation on the game laws, pointing out their extreme utility, and absolute necessity. This lasted until our arrival at Speenhamland, where the coach-passengers dined. I was quite satisfied with the sample I had seen, and declined accompanying them any further. But I handed a very pretty young woman from the coach, whose face, for the first time, became visible as she unmuffled it, to save herself from stumbling. She proved to be the daughter to Latitat, who, upon the strength of my Lord Squash's cause, had taken her to see the giants at Guildhall, and the lions at the Tower.

I pulled off my hat to the party, and wished them good morning. My friend in the hat said, that he was sorry to part from me, as he had hoped we should all have gone on to Bath as comfortably as we had come the last five miles. My friend in the bonnet observed to my friend in the hat, after I had left them, that I was as pretty a kind of a young man as need be seen on a summer's day. The lawyer took better measures; he saw that Giles was one of my appurtenances; and, while my chaise and four was getting ready, contrived to cross-examine him out of his master's name. Latitat then advanced towards me with much ceremony, and after favouring me with his address at Loampit Bottom, Muddiford, near Taunton, hoped if I had any professional business in the west of England, that I would seek an honest lawyer.—“ Lord Squash, my Lord Winterbourne, will, I am sure, be my passport for integrity. You are, of course, my Lord, acquainted with a man of my Lord Squash's eminence?”

“ I really, Sir, have not the honour.”

“ Amazing! but your Lordship, I suppose, like myself, has hid your abilities under a bushel. If I had scope——”

“ Good morning, Sir.”

“ If I had but scope, my Lord——”

“ I do not in the least doubt it, Sir, but my chaise I see is waiting——”

“ I will not detain your Lordship five minutes——”

“ Pardon me, Sir ; you are perfectly welcome to my button, and if you will oblige me with your penknife, I’ll cut it off ; but as to myself, you will have the goodness to excuse me. Good day, Sir.”

The wheels again moved swiftly upon their axletrees, and the lamps of the wished for city appeared before my eyes as I descended Kingsdown Hill. I had hastened to it with the same eagerness as if it had actually contained my soul’s treasure. The abbey clock struck eleven as I was landed at the White Hart, and I was thoroughly out of humour that it was too late to make the necessary enquiries after the Berrington family. I examined the master, mistress, waiters and porters, to no purpose. They were all strangers to the name.

In the morning, to the annoyance of every body, I rose by break of day, which, as the nights were somewhere about the longest, was not very early. My breakfast was no sooner dispatched, than I sallied forth to make a search, which a moment's thought would have convinced me to be useless. I turned over the leaves of the pump-room book of arrivals, and applied for information at all the libraries, and at the assembly-rooms, but there was no appearance of the name of Berrington.

Five days passed in fruitless expectation, during which my only pleasure consisted in daily riding several miles on the road which led to Worcester.

On the sixth day I had the supreme felicity of hailing the carriage which contained my beloved. My own sensations at the visible pleasure which shone in Lydia's eyes, at the moment; I would not have exchanged to have been lord of the universe.

Apartments were soon procured.— Somehow or other I considered myself as one of the family, and appeared to be received as such. I gave the necessary orders to insure their comforts, and found my exertions amply repaid by a smile from Lydia. My passion, so far from being abated, had increased by absence. The image I had cherished in my mind, fell infinitely short of the lovely original. I had made no formal declaration of my attachment, but yet took upon myself all the airs of a received and favoured lover. Probably the union of hearts rendered a declaration unnecessary. Thus become the constant attendant upon Lydia, I had every opportunity of proving her to be in the possession of a well-stored mind, of a delicate sensibility, and of a warm heart. Formality was now banished; Lydia was not averse to hang upon my arm, and, upon occasions, willingly listened to my observations without impatience, even when her mother and sister had got considerably the start of us.

What I was myself at that time now pains me to think. Love had developed many amiable qualities which had previously been concealed. It had elevated me into a consciousness of self-importance, for the happiness of another, and that other, my soul's idol, was dependent upon myself. To Lydia my attachment was fervid and sincere. I admired and gloried in her beauty, but I adored her mind. Every day discovered fresh accomplishments, and every hour made me more and more satisfied as to the propriety of my choice.

Whenever I have ventured to recal those scenes to my mind, it has often struck me as remarkable that the first mention of my desire to form a part of the Berrington family, was in coolly conversing with Lydia respecting some arrangements for our marriage. I had quietly settled the formula of the ceremony, and the steps which were to be subsequently taken. As it was winter, I made up my mind that the honey-moon could not be passed to such advantage any where as in London. We were, I was satisfied, every thing to each other; privacy was therefore our object; and where could privacy be so completely indulged as in a crowd.

Lydia suffered me to go on for some time without interruption, but, at last, broke silence with——

“ Pray, my Lord, do you not think that the consent of two persons, at least, is requisite for such a transaction?"

"Well, and what then?"

"You have consulted with my mother of course?"

"No; I had no conception of its being necessary. Your mother, I am sure——"

"At least you have your own consent?"

"Nonsense! this is trifling. I want your opinion——"

"But I think my opinion of what you have been proposing is a secondary consideration. Something else is first of all necessary. My mother, you allow, has not consented, for you have not consulted her. As to my poor father, you know, he is out of the question. But to return; I asked if you had obtained your own consent—you did not make any reply, except nonsense and trifling. As you make me no answer now, I shall construe silence in the usual way, and assume, that if you spoke at all, it would be in the affirmative. That's one party, and I'll grant you, is half way through the business. Do you not think it possible that something else may be wanting—a trifle, perhaps hardly worthy of consideration."

"Do not tease me, Lydia; I am speaking seriously——"

"So am I, my Lord. Pray, my Lord, did it never strike you that my consent was of a little importance in such a case? it may even be vanity in me to presume myself at all in question; but, to save trouble, I'll plead guilty to the vanity. Did your Lordship ever ask my consent?"

I felt the full force of her expressions, and my own unwarrantable negligence. The blood rushed up in my face, and I was overwhelmed with confusion. I stammered out some apologies, and attributed the omission to an idea which I had suffered myself to entertain, that I had"—I then hesitated.

"What?"

"—— the possession of her heart."

"And so, my Lord, the poor thing is to flutter its wings, just as you please, and then to perch at the word of command."

I saw kindness lurking in Lydia's eye, and on my knees I proffered myself and fortune. I was proceeding rapturously in my expressions of adoration and constancy, when I was interrupted with——

"No heroics, my Lord! I am above all false delicacy. Here is my hand, my heart has ceased to be at my disposal."

I took instant possession of my bargain, and sealed the contract upon her pouting lips.

Every thing appeared settled, and the ceremony alone was remaining to make me the happiest man in the creation.

CHAP. VIII.

DISTRACTION.

BUT fate thought proper to decree otherwise. One wet morning I had strayed alone to the pump room to loiter away the time until my usual hour of visiting Lydia. I had scarcely entered when I heard my name vociferated from the part opposite to where I then was. I turned to the quarter whence the voices proceeded, and immediately recognized two young men with whom in my days of empty grandeur I had been on terms of intimacy. Vexed as I was to find myself assailed by a couple of incorrigible puppies, decency required me to treat them with some degree of attention. They joined me, and craved my assistance in getting rid of the morning. The Honourable Edward Viperly expressing himself dying of ennui, and Capt. Feather of the Guards declaring that it would be impossible to survive through the week. "But," said the Captain, "Winterbourne will infuse a little life into us, and prevent us from sinking into downright inanity."

"You have been here, I suppose some time, Winterbourne," said Viperly, "and can put us into a good thing or two. Old Beau Nash was right. All the fruit here is either too green or too mellow. I imagine if any thing decent drops from the clouds it is snapt up in a moment. Have you a taste for tabbies, Winterbourne?"

"— With tea and turn out," added the Captain.

“What do you say, Feather, to a dance this evening with the lovely Angelica Mushroom, the tallow chandler’s daughter. But, Winterbourne, you are dumb, man! Where’s all your sparkling vivacity, that was wont to set the table in a roar. ~~What~~ What, silent still!”

“Don’t you see, Viperly what’s the matter?—Look at him, poor devil; he is over head and ears in love.”

“Then we shall have something worth seeing. Winterbourne’s a fellow of taste. He shall take us to his goddess, for nothing under divinity would do for him. But, a propos, Feather, do you know that mother Berrington and her chickens are at Bath. Upon my soul Lyddy is a devilish fine girl. Poor thing, she must be upon her last legs though, for her mother has been hawking her about upon sale for these three last years.”

“Are you acquainted with Mrs. Berrington?” said I.

“Who that has ever been at a watering place, is not,” said the Captain; “the Berrington’s are as well known as the master of the ceremonies, and are as indefatigable in becoming acquainted with every bachelor who has a settlement to make.”

I had heard sufficient to create sensations of a most painful nature. My agitation I doubt not was perfectly apparent, for they made no opposition to my withdrawing myself. I hastily made my excuses, told them where they would find me, and returned to my apartments overwhelmed with vexation.

The shortness of my acquaintance with the Berrington family, and the place of our meeting, seemed to confirm what I had just heard. Dr. Bubbleby had told me that they had been at Scarborough, I first saw them at Harrowgate, and I was now in attendance upon them at Bath. It was true, their conduct in every instance had been marked with the strictest propriety. I could perceive no disposition about Mrs. Berrington to expose her daughters to public view, and Lydia appeared always desirous of avoiding the distinction which her beauty so richly deserved. But, on the other hand, might not this have been all artifice. I was a prize well worth the care of a fortune hunter. They might have studied my disposition and acted accordingly. Where, I thought, would be the necessity of encouraging a fresh lover until the matter was decided with myself.

I saw that I was on the eve of being a third time a dupe to my hasty impressions, and that upon a point which admitted of no remedy. Villiers was gone, and had left me the wreck of my fortune to remember him by. Dr.

Bubbleby had the possession of a good living, but I was still independent. But in an unfortunate marriage every future day would inevitably be a day of repentance.

The amiable and attractive manners of Lydia appeared to me one moment, as so many enticing allurements. In the next, love effaced every disadvantageous thought. Her personal charms were figured in my imagination in all their refulgent brightness. But were they not the stale refusals of a hundred empty fops? I, summoned prudence to my aid, but she only hovered at a distance.

My perturbation increased as the usual hour of my visiting Lydia approached. I dreaded the meeting—I doubted my own firmness. I wished to spare her feelings and to conceal my own. But all my endeavours were fruitless,—the sight of Lydia, who spite of the prejudices I had nourished, look more lovely than ever in my eyes, added to my disorder, and completed my confusion.

“ You look ill,” said she, applying her hand to my forehead. “ Good heavens! how feverish you are. Tell me what has occurred, I have a right to know——”

Mrs. Berrington joined in her daughter’s solicitude. The suspicions which had racked me, gave way before the agony of Lydia, which I felt could not be counterfeited. I was once more happy, but it was only the deceitful calm which precedes a storm. My fever subsided, and my looks regained their wonted serenity. Lydia resumed her cheerfulness, and the prospect was again brilliant.

When on my pillow, the flow of suspicion was more violent than the ebb. Lydia was no longer before me; her image no longer proclaimed her innocence. I was tortured by the most horrible sensations I had ever experienced,—my night was sleepless, and I rose in the morning with the determination of following the dictates of prudence, by seeking an explanation of my doubts, and, if I found it necessary, of sacrificing my present attachment to my future welfare.

The events of this day I am incapable of writing. I dashed the cup of happiness from my grasp, and for the remainder of my life, have swallowed the waters of bitterness and regret.

A painter once, who doubted the powers of his pencil in the delineation of excessive grief, covered the face of the heroine of his picture with her hands. In like manner I must throw a veil over scenes which I want the power to describe. The reader must therefore fill up the blank in the way most likely to move his feelings. As years have failed in reconciling me to my loss, I must be excused from an attempt in which I should most assuredly fail.

My morning visit was paid as usual. Thoughtful and silent, I soon found the room left to Lydia and myself. They only who have loved can read a lover's heart;—mine was rent to pieces. Conversation soon led to explanation. To conceal a thought from the object of an ardent attachment is impossible;—the heart, every where in motion, speaks from the lips. My suspicions, founded on the foolish tales, which I as foolishly repeated, roused the indignation of Lydia. I would have given the world to have retracted what I had said. Her delicacy was wounded, and wounded by the man in whom she had reposed an unbounded confidence. I deserved to suffer, but perhaps not to that extent to which the conscious pride of Lydia condemned me. I was doomed to hear the last words which she ever uttered to me, and to view the lovely object of my affections for the last time.

“ My Lord,” said my fair one, with a dignity of demeanour I had never before witnessed, “ I have been mistaken—our acquaintance has indeed been short—too short to enable us to place a proper estimate on our mutual dispositions. I thought your’s was noble and generous. I fondly imagined that your heart was warm and feeling as my own. Your openness inspired a confidence in your principles and I neglected those precautions which custom has prescribed. But I am deceived,—I am now punished for my fault. Henceforward, my lord, we are strangers——farewell!”

She advanced to the door—I was proceeding to impede her progress, for the purpose of imploring her forgiveness, and throwing myself upon her mercy, but a look petrified me. The door was opened and was closed. For some time I was motionless, my mind wavering between present despair and future hope. But something was requisite to be done. I rang the bell and through the medium of the servant requested to see Mrs. Berrington. After a short interval she entered and requested to know my pleasure. I could not speak——

“My daughter, my Lord,” said the matron, “requires my attendance, you will excuse me.”

“These words were accompanied with a movement of the hand which indicated a wish for my absence.

“Pray, Madam, one single moment. Tell me that I have a chance of forgiveness——”

“You have given no offence, my Lord, that I am aware of. You are free and unshackled in your actions, and should be so in your thoughts.— You are free and unshackled, my Lord, I repeat, and so is my daughter.

“ Good heavens, Mrs. Berrington, let me not have sentence passed upon me so rashly. I have offended—grievously offended, but do not crush all hopes of forgiveness. Intercede for me, my more than mother !”

“ Me! my Lord. I am a party concerned. My daughter, I trust, knows what is due to her own dignity and that of her family. You found us, my Lord, independent, and you will leave us so. The man who should possess the affections of my Lydia, would possess a treasure which worlds could not purchase, and the man who has once lost them will never regain them. It is but a few days since we first met. The parting, I hope, will give but little pain. It is inevitable. I wish your Lordship every happiness; I applaud your prudence and I am grateful for your attentions. They will now cease to be pleasing. It is a waste of time, my lord,—you degrade yourself,—allow me to retire. It will always be gratifying to hear of your lordship's welfare.”

I was again left alone, and as I did not see any present prospect of reconciliation, I took up my hat and reluctantly left the house.

CHAP. IX:SATISFACTION.

I WENT into the street more dead than alive, and had scarcely proceeded ten paces when I was tapped on the shoulder by the captain, who was walking arm in arm with his honourable companion.

“ I’ll be hanged,” said the Captain, “ if Lydia has not scratched his face. He is as doleful as an undertaker of twenty years standing.”

“ Never mind, man,” said the other, “ you’ll kiss and be friends before night.—Lovers’ quarrels, you know——”

“ Let us turn back, Viperly,” cried the Captain, “ Winterbourne shall introduce us to his paragon of loveliness, I long to see her.”

“ Why she is your old acquaintance, Captain Feather !”

“ Oh, no !” said Viperly, “ Weathercock told us that you were up to your neck in the dish, and we thought a little acid would improve the flavour of the sauce. Have we not done it neatly.”

“ And what you have told me is a lie ?——”

“ Be careful, Winterbourne ! you are in love, and that will excuse impetuosity. Go back—kiss and be friends, and invite me to the wedding. I’ll be father to the bride, and Feather here shall stand gossip to the first child. Well, if you wont go back, you shall go with us. Feather, what shall we do with ourselves ? we must not leave leave Winterbourne, lest he should be found dangling in his garter."

"Pardon me, Mr. Viperly, the retailer of a falsehood is with me on a par with a liar. I must beg to decline associating either with one or the other. Good morning, gentlemen."

I was too much absorbed in my own thoughts to observe what was passing with the destroyers of my peace, for such I considered them. My mind was exclusively employed on the means, of making my peace with Lydia.

I called at the usual hour of dinner. The servant came down with, Mrs. Berrington's compliments, a head ache deprived her of the pleasure of receiving me. I requested a moment's conversation with any one of the family. "To-morrow morning they would be at my service."

For the morrow I impatiently longed. The evening was occupied in writing a long letter to Lydia, explanatory of my conduct, and containing a relation of the actual circumstances which led to the unhappy misunderstanding. This I sent by Giles about ten o'clock, charging him on no account to return without an answer.—“To-morrow I should have a reply.”

The night was passed in greater tranquillity than I experienced on the preceding one. My suspicions were wholly dissipated. Hope buoyed up my spirits, and calmed the agitation of my mind. I had almost reasoned myself into a belief, that I ought to consider myself more happy in consequence of what had passed—for I imagined that the noble behaviour of Lydia was a proof at once of the purity of her heart, and of the disinterestedness of her attachment.

A letter was put into my hand at the breakfast table directed by the younger sister. I kissed the seal, and tore open the envelope. It contained my own letter of the last evening untouched, but not a word of comment or remark. I flew to the lodgings. The lady and her daughters had left Bath at six o'clock in the morning.

I was overpowered and sunk upon the floor. The moment I came to my recollection I found my head supported by the mistress of the house, while the servant girl was applying a bottle of hartshorn to my nose.

My inquiries as to the direction they had taken were vain. The woman had asked their address in case it might be wanted—"They expected no letters."—Equally fruitless were my endeavours at the different inns. No description that I could give could serve me till the return of the post boys. From them I could obtain nothing satisfactory. Three different parties had left Bath at nearly the same time, and all from Milsom Street. I gave myself up to despair. I could not doubt the extent of my misery, for I felt satisfied that there remained not the least probability of a reconciliation, or such care would not have been taken to have blinded me in the pursuit.

In a state of melancholy dejection, I returned to my own apartments. As I entered I was informed that a gentleman had been for some time waiting my return. It was no less a personage than Captain Feather, who after a long preface, expressive of the disagreeable situation in which he found himself placed, told me, that it was impossible for him to say, whether he felt more friendship for my Lord Winterbourne, than he did for Mr. Viperly; they both ranked high in his esteem.

“To the purpose, Sir, I have no time for nonsense.”

“Then, my Lord, I beg leave to remind your Lordship of some expressions you inadvertently made use of towards Mr. Viperly. They were apparently uttered with some warmth. Your Lordship will I am sure see the propriety of affording to Mr. Viperly the satisfaction of — a — a

“What, Sir!”

“An apology, my Lord!”

“An apology, Sir!”

“Yes, my Lord, or in case such a line of conduct does not meet your Lordship’s approbation, you will probably be pleased to name some friend with whom I can confer, on the arrangements preliminary to a meeting between Mr. Viperly and your Lordship.”

“Look ye—Tell that liar, Mr. Viperly, Sir, that one scoundrel should not have sent a message to a man of honour by another scoundrel. There’s the door or the window, Sir, take your choice, but instantly decide.”

The captain chose the door and passed it without attempting any reply.

In the state I was in, it would have given me no uneasiness to have been shot at by half the people on the earth. It would, indeed, under my present feelings have been an act of kindness to have taken me out of a world in which my fairest prospects had been blighted and destroyed.

Of course, I did not expect that either Feather or Viperly would let the matter rest where it was, and therefore remained at home to receive any person, which either or both might think proper to send. In the interval I tried to suggest some feasible plan for the recovery of Lydia. The admiral's relations in Worcestershire were a sure resource. I determined instantly to go to them to beg their intercession. But who were they? I could recollect nothing more of them, than that they lived near Worcester, and that their names were ~~not~~ Berrington. Here I was at fault again, and at fault without the chance of getting in the right scent.

I did not remain at home in vain. In less than an hour, two gentlemen were announced to me as Major Hatton and Lieutenant Price; the former on the part of Viperly, the latter on that of Feather. Satisfaction was demanded on the part of both, and the demand was instantly acceded to.

“There is, however, one difficulty gentlemen; I am a stranger in Bath, and am not aware of any friend whom I could trouble on such occasions as these. Perhaps, Major, as a soldier and a man of honour, I could venture to solicit your advice and assistance.”

The Major who was sitting near the window recollected himself a moment, and then exclaimed, “Run, Price, there is Wilford going across the churchyard. Although no soldier, my Lord, Mr. Wilford is a man of the strictest honour, and in my opinion no one can be more proper to advise you."

A gentleman about forty years of age returned with the Lieutenant.

"Come, Wilford," said the Major, "you have now an opportunity of conferring a favour. Here is a young nobleman who has two duels upon his hands, and is without a friend to either. Will you stand by him?"

Mr. Wilford after some hesitation consented. I regretted the want of pistols, with which the Major undertook to supply me. It was then settled that we should meet at the Sham Castle in exactly two hours from the present time, and that to avoid suspicion we should proceed by different routes.

As we slowly proceeded, Mr. Wilford remarked the dejection of my countenance, and attributed it to a dislike to the act in which I was about to be engaged.

" I see, my Lord, or at least, I think I see, that your sentiments of duelling accord with my own. I consented to accompany you, that I might become the peacemaker. While we walk on, I must know the grounds of the quarrel. Most disagreements proceed from trivial circumstances, and generally stand more in need of explanation than apology.

I recapitulated the leading circumstances, and concluded by saying that I had applied epithets towards the destroyers of my peace, which I was satisfied were well merited. As such, I could neither retract nor apologise. Life was to me of little importance, and they might as well seal the infamous falsehood which had been the means of depriving existence of every charm, with my death. It was not likely, I continued, that either of the parties would be satisfied without such concessions as would be impossible for me to make. I was never backward in acknowledging a fault.

“Then why, my good friend, do you decline to do so in the present instance. It is no proof of cowardice to allow that you spoke without thought, and under the influence of passion.”

“I did not speak without thought, or if I did, I am now cool and collected and I should repeat the expressions. I think I can anticipate what you were going to say. You think that the utterance of them under any circumstances is a breach of decorum. I fear we shall differ on this point; I have a sense of injuries which place decorum entirely out of the question. Let me not trespass upon your kindness. You have, perhaps, come only from a benevolent motive. I will readily release you from your promise of attending me. I have no doubt that as Major Hatton and Lieutenant Price will be both on the ground, I shall induce them alternately to act as my friend."

"No, no! my Lord, that is not my disposition. I have never yet deserted my colours, and it is too late to begin now: besides I have still a chance. If they are men, they will be more anxious to amend than to increase their fault. If they are unworthy of the name of men, you will not find me a flincher."

We were the first on the ground; a surgeon, procured by Mr. Wilford, being at a short distance. The scoundrels as I shall still call them, with their seconds, were not long after us. Mr. Wilford reasoned with them apart. His exertions were not attended with success. They had meanness enough, I suppose, to propagate a falsehood, and had a sufficiency of honour to defend it. Mr. Wilford shrugged his shoulders at seeing that there were no hopes of accommodation. He then, with Major Hatton, measured out the ground, and deposited a pistol in my hand, which he had carefully primed and loaded. The major did the same to Viperly, who being the first aggrieved, was entitled to the first satisfaction. At the signal agreed upon, we fired at the same instant. I shot at random, to Viperly's complete satisfaction. The ball entered somewhere about his hip, and according to the opinion of the Major, the wound was likely to be mortal. An instant flight was recommended by the seconds, and the signal for summoning the surgeon was proposed to be given. Wilford strongly pressed upon me to make an immediate retreat, and I was half disposed to follow his advice; but Captain Feather, supposing probably that a rencontre between us would be prevented, insisted upon his having his share of satisfaction.

“Dem him, he was not come here to be trifled with ; no man of honour could submit to it."

" But the wounded man, Captain Feather," said Wilford.

" Oh !" said the valiant Captain, " Viperly will keep for a few minutes, and then, perhaps, he may have company."

The poor wounded wretch was writhing in agony, and praying for assistance. But the more urgent he was, the more the Captain roared out for "satisfaction,"

At last Wilford snatched up another pistol, and calling to Price, told him to lose no time.

Feather took the instrument of death in his hand, but on a groan from Viperly, he seemed inclined to relent.

" Come, Sir," cried Wilford, " the trifling now is on your side."

I again fired, without attempting to take aim ; probably if I had I might have missed. But my bullet took it, and the valiant Captain had the satisfaction of losing the best part of his nose.

His cries of the second wounded completely drowned those of the first.

His vociferations not only summed up the surgeon, but some people were at work at a considerable distance.

It was now time for me to decamp. In the company of Mr. Wilford, I took the best of my way into Bath, from whence, after settling a mode of correspondence by which I could ascertain the fate of Viperly, I set off for London, as the best place of concealment.

CHAP. X.CONSEQUENCES.

THUS ended my only prospect of earthly felicity: I have dropped the pen to contemplate the paradise from which I expelled myself: From that time to the present hour, I have heard nothing of Lydia. Perhaps she may yet be living, and, perhaps, as the tender helpmate of some worthy man, who knows how to appreciate her value. Perhaps these pages may come before her eye; she will then do justice to my heart, and, perhaps, she may regret her hasty decision. As circumstances have made me, from what may she not have escaped ; but what might I not have been, had my hand been given where my heart could have securely rested, in confidence and affection. I will fancy that she yet lives. I will tell her that the remembrance of our mutual regard, momentarily sheds its seraphic influence over a breast, soured by disappointment, but only that it may again experience the bitter pangs of regret.

It is said that people can love but once in their lives ; at least I can vouch that it has been my case. From this time forward, my character and disposition are to be considered as remodelled. The current of my blood will run in a steady course. I shall neither love nor be loved. But it is needless to anticipate.

Before I proceed with my story, however, I shall indulge myself with

remarking upon the unfortunate situation of young women, who have had the misfortune to be often attendant at places of public amusement. The trade of "husband hunting" is so contemptible in the eyes of one sex, and so degrading to the character of the other, that all parents who have the interest and happiness of their children at heart, would do well to consider the consequences, before they give their daughters the appearance of being exposed for sale. The idea of husband hunting was familiarised to me long before I had heard it laid as an imputation against Lydia and her mother. Mrs. Cranbrook, when I was in the height of my gaiety, and when the good lady plainly saw that there was no chance of either of the Miss Cranbrooks attracting any satisfactory share of my attention, one day lamented to me that she had done every thing in her power for her daughters; she had taken them to Bath, Weymouth, Tunbridge, Brighton, Rainsgate, Scarborough, and half a score other places, and had brought them home again no better than they went. Mothers are thoroughly mistaken in the policy of the plan, which I can look upon in no other light than as a legal prostitution. Many an amiable young creature has been thus held up to ridicule and contempt, who, under more fortunate auspices, might have exalted the character of a wife.

In many cases, I am inclined to suspect, that although the establishment of daughters may be the ostensible object, it is only a cloak for the mother's love of gaiety and dissipation. The Duchess of Norwich courted in person for her daughters. She marked her victims, and contrived to worry the poor Benedicts into the matrimonial noose. The Countess of Alderney, the fascinating grandmother of the loves, permitted but one rival at a time to approach the throne. The mother was the companion of her daughter, till a suitable offer presented itself; the vacancy was then filled up by the next in succession. Thus the matron wisely husbanded her pleasures, and the charms of her daughters.

Unfortunately, the evil does not end with those who deservedly labour under the imputation. The second visit to the same place, or a transition from one place of public resort to another, let the motive be what it may, exposes persons whose views are of a nature wholly different, to be classed under the general head of "husband hunters." I have already said, that what I had seen of the Berrington's threw an air of probability upon the remarks made by the destroyers of my peace; but with my usual impetuosity, I had forgotten that Mrs. Berrington had informed me, that she had parted with her husband at Scarborough. That the health of her youngest daughter had led her to Harrowgate, and that by the advice of her husband, she had fixed upon Bath as the place of her residence, till the Admiral's return.

I could not, on reflection, blame Lydia for her resentment. I had gone too far to have receded with credit to myself. But I cannot help thinking, that her anger was carried to too great a length. Lydia, however, as much surpassed every other female, in the native delicacy of her mind, as she did in the beauty of her person. The wound was incurable, and it was inflicted by myself.

To return to my narrative, I arrived in London, and fixed myself in an obscure part of the town, attended only by Giles, whose livery I exchanged for plain clothes, meaning there to await the issue of Viperly's fate. I received a daily account from Mr.

Wilford, which, for the first fortnight, was by no means of a flattering nature. The ball had lodged in a situation from whence it baffled the skill of the surgeons to extract it. On the fourteenth day they succeeded in removing it; and, at the expiration of a month, he was declared to be free from danger. I was now at liberty to resume, or more properly speaking, to commence my search after the Berrington family. But I had lost the most valuable time, and I despaired, after so long an interval, of following the track which they had taken from Bath. Could I have immediately pursued them, even if I had been obliged to trace all the three chaises which started on the eventful morning, I might, perchance, have succeeded.

Bath, however, was, at all events, my first point, and to Bath I returned. I called on Mr. Wilford to express my thanks for his kindness and attention, and to make another enquiry respecting the gentlemen I had so amply satisfied. I was received with the warmth of a friend. Wilford was pleased to praise my steadiness and coolness; and requested, that as the affair was now over, I would permit him to lead me to my former friends, who, he could assure me, were severely punished for their thoughtless behaviour. But to this I could by no means bring myself to consent. The injury was too great to be forgiven. I should have been sorry to have had the blood of either of them upon my head, but short of that I was indifferent as to what had befallen them.

Wilford told me that he verily believed Feather was the most sensibly hurt of the two. The contour of a very handsome face had been destroyed by the mutilation of its leading feature. He had been obliged to sell his commission, as he declared; the impossibility of wearing his darling red coat, in the state to which he had been reduced. Nobody, perhaps would have given him credit for fighting a duel; and without a nose he might have been suspected of not losing it in the wars of Mars. As to Viperly, he bore his sufferings with a considerable degree of fortitude, acquitting me of all blame in the transactions, and forbidding any proceedings in case of his death. He acknowledged himself to have been highly to blame, in his foolish conduct towards me; and expressed a firm hope, that what he had done might still be remedied.

From Bath I made my way to Worcester. But I could hear of no person in the neighbourhood who had the slightest knowledge of Admiral Berrington. From Worcester I made a round to every place of public resort in the kingdom, with no greater success. I even ventured to Harrowgate; but here my wounds were opened afresh.

In this fruitless search I consumed nearly two years, during which time I was frequently in London. Once my presence was required there to sign the conveyance of my London House. It had originally cost me ten thousand guineas, and I had expended no small sum in fitting it up. I now sold the whole, as it stood, with the fixtures included, for seven thousand pounds. The final settlement of the business devolved upon Mr. Nalder. I had wished him to place the money in the funds. My expenditure was considerably within my income; and I did not now, attach any vast importance at having a large balance in the hands of my bankers. Mr. Nalder, however, undertook to dispose of the money, more, as he said, to my advantage. The funds were then high, and would afford, comparatively, but little interest, to what he could insure me, with perfect safety. Of course, I could not object to following the advice of a man of such undoubted respectability.

My next call to London was on the death of my father. This event took place about a twelvemonth after my Bath adventure. I had never seen him since our unhappy difference; but notwithstanding the little intercourse which had taken place between us, and the want of cordiality at our last separation, I could not help sincerely regretting that my surviving parent had quitted the world without bestowing on me his benediction. Whatever might have been his faults and failings, his son could have no right to sit in judgment upon him. His embarrassments had certainly hastened his end; and I can never acquit myself for neglecting to enquire into his situation, and to administer to his wants. The amount of his incumbrances were sufficient to justify my refusal to alienate the ancient possessions of my family ; but I still might have done a great deal towards promoting his comforts.

As far as I am enabled to estimate my father's character, he was a man to whom Nature had furnished an average portion of advantages and disadvantages. If she was bountiful in one respect, she was niggardly in another. A deficiency of sense was counterpoised by a handsome person ; and a ruggedness of temper, which at times was distressing, not only to himself, but to those about him, was counterbalanced by the gifts of fortune: He had the means of rewarding those who could submit to his humours, and thus incurred the debts of gratitude to no one. He was surrounded by dependents even to the last, but he had no friends. I shall soon finish the portrait. I have no particular virtues to enumerate, and I have no right to record his vices.

I was now Earl of Erpingham, and possessor of sixty thousand a year. But grandeur had lost all its attractions, and this accession to my fortune only made me feel more bitterly the loss I had sustained, in my estrangement from Lydia. The blank in my heart remained open, and I began to perceive the paucity of enjoyments which riches could procure.

CHAP. XI.INTEGRITY.

THE Erpingham estate commanded three boroughs, besides the preponderating interest in the county. At the time that I had agreed to dock the entails, it was proposed that I should have taken my seat in the senate; but subsequent events, and the want of political ambition prevented it. After the difference with my father, however, I was repeatedly applied to by the agents of those who were willing to procure my return, for a valuable consideration. The death of my father, in this respect, made a most sensible difference in my situation. As Sir Pertinax Mac Sycophant observes, "I had three boroughs, and had only to put in six broomsticks to represent them." But my patronage made me a personage of no small importance. I was eagerly sought after by the great political leaders, and was pestered both by ministerialists and oppositionists, with reasons to convince me that it was my bounden duty, if I had the good of my country at heart, to range myself under their respective banners. Power, influence, and place, if I chose it, were the baits on one side, and popularity on the other.—I declined the one, and detested the other. I had neither the talents nor the inclination to lead, and I scorned to be a tool. At all events, I conceived that it was time enough to declare my sentiments on a dissolution of parliament, as my broomsticks, or whatever they might be, were at present firmly seated. Each party indeed told me, that on my declaring my sentiments, the broomsticks, in order to be again returned, would vote according to my directions. With all my penetration, however, I could never discover any other difference between the party in and the party out, except that the one possessed what the other longed for. They appeared to be equally self-interested, and therefore equally unworthy of public confidence. I saw sufficient to despise both, and in the humour I was then in, conceived that it was the duty of every independent man to be independent in principle, and to be guided by the real circumstance, and not by condemning or approving every measure, according to the side of the house from whence it springs.

My first step, after I had accustomed myself to feel as Earl of Erpingham, was, to give orders that the family-seat, which had been suffered to fall into a state of decay, by the negligence or want of means on the part of its late possessor, should be replaced in its former magnificence. The town mansion I left for the present as I found it. I had already experienced the furnishing of a town house, and, in this case, resolved not to incur any unnecessary expences, till I could ascertain what my inclinations really were. Such parts of the furniture as were not strictly heirloom, I was obliged to ransom from my father's creditors. The amount was indeed small, as a recent execution had stripped the house of the principal part of its moveables.

These arrangements for a time suspended my search after Lydia, but before they could be considered as completed I recommenced it with fresh vigour. Every news-paper teemed with paragraphs respecting the accession of Lord Winterbourne to the Erpingham title and estates. I thought this might be a temptation and induce her to furnish me with some clue to discover her present residence. I inserted many penitential advertisements, addressed in such a way, that if they met her view, they could not possibly be mistaken. This course I regretted I had not taken in the first instance, it might then, perhaps, before her heart was completely steeled, have been successful. Time, however, had calmed my feelings and reconciled me to a loss which I had begun to consider as irreparable. I contented myself with offering up my prayers for her happiness, and with paying her ten times a day the tribute of a sigh.

The sudden death of Mr. Nalder again led me to the metropolis. My affairs were still in an unsettled state, and I conceived that it would be highly proper for me to examine them personally. I had the highest opinion of Mr. Nalder, in whose hands, on the death of my father, I had placed the entire management of all my concerns. His manners and known probity had induced me to repose in him an unlimited confidence.

I attended his funeral as a testimony of respect to departed worth. In regretting the loss of a valuable man, I was joined by some of the leading characters in the country, who, like myself, had benefited, or thought they had benefited, by his professional exertions. The body was buried in a style, which, to me, had the appearance of ostentation; and, I understood that a most superb monument was ordered to be erected in Shenfield church. I thought, considering the situation Mr. Nalder held in life, a great part of the useless expence would have been better applied to the uses of his family, particularly as I remembered his declaring himself not to be so rich as the world supposed. But I was aware that many people had strong prejudices in favour of a splendid funeral; and I had heard of several widows who had sacrificed their whole worldly substance, in order to convey the remains of their husbands to the grave with what they termed becoming splendour. As to myself, I never see a pompous funeral without thinking of that of the great Condé, where the hearse being opened during the procession, the attendants within were discovered playing at hazard on the coffin which contained his earthly remains. Mr. Nalder, a short time previous to his decease, had admitted an old clerk and a young relation into partnership with him. I cannot say that I felt satisfied; but I was, on the whole, rather loth to deprive them of business, particularly as they must necessarily be well acquainted with my affairs. But the imposing manners of Mr. Nalder were wanting; they commanded a confidence, while those of his successors only requested it.

Many days had not elapsed when I received a letter, desiring me to meet the other creditors of the late Mr. Nalder, at his late chambers, in order to take the state of his affairs into consideration. My astonishment was beyond every thing, when, by a statement put into my hands, I perceived that this pious man of known probity,—this careful father,—this hypocrite, whose principles forbade the use of Sunday but for religious observances,—this honest lawyer, had died in debt, chiefly to his clients, to the enormous amount of one hundred and fifty thousand pounds; and that too without any visible means of expenditure. My loss, compared with my present fortune, was trivial; but I felt for the widow (not his own,) deprived of her support, and the orphan of his inheritance. His death I observed was sudden, whether by the visitation of Providence, or by his own hand I could never learn, but I have often wished for the pillow on which such a man could rest his head.

The assets forth coming left but little hope of a dividend, as the estate at Shenfield was mortgaged among his own clients for double its value. Mr. Nalder, as he promised, had disposed of my money, and possibly to the best advantage, for I never again put myself in the way of being deceived.

His hypocrisy had been carried to a greater length than I ever heard of in any other instance. One of his clients complained that he had been worried to sell a capital estate, at a price infinitely below its value, even although he was not in want of money; half the amount was pretended to be secured on the Shenfield estate, and the other half was totally gone. So well had he carried on the deception that I was told by his brother-in-law that about a month before his death, Mr. Nalder had called upon him, and observed that he had now settled his affairs, and had made his mind easy by the distribution of his property among his children. He was in want, he said, of eight hundred pounds for a short time for a specific purpose, but was loth to sell out in the present low state of the funds, particularly as it would disturb his arrangements. The eight hundred pounds were lent, and thus his own family was made a dupe of his rascality.

A smooth easy tongue is naturally guarded against, but who would suspect deceit to lie beneath the exterior of a bear. Brutality disarms suspicion, and harshness of manners, however, it may disgust on personal intercourse, certainly promotes confidence in a legal adviser. Where there is no apparent wish to please, no one will suspect an intention to deceive.

I was now almost in a similar situation with that of Jaffier, and could thank Heaven that I had not a ducat in the world. I was wholly freed from the trouble of superintending a personal estate, and as to my landed property, it was only for my life. Like the Duke of Grimsby, as I had not the disposal of any part at my death, I reckoned it as nothing.

As I could sell no part of my estates, and as I had no intention of making any purchases, a lawyer was a useless incumbrance. There are, indeed, two reasons, some one has observed, why a lawyer should not be trusted, and I have always, at least since my transactions with Mr. Nalder, considered them to be founded on justice, and of an unanswerable nature: the first is "when you do not know him," the second, "when you do." My communications, with the exception of "Charley" at the spunging house, had been confined to Mr. Bearblock and Mr. Nalder; the former I am satisfied had cheated me in my infancy, and the latter I was no less certain had preyed upon my maturity. But of the two I would give Mr. Bearblock the preference, as having the least hypocrisy.

I enquired the fate of my chancery suit against my late trustee, and was given to understand, that in about three years, if all due diligence was used, the cause might come to a hearing. I desired to see the opinions of the counsel that had been called in, but they seemed as applicable to every other case as to mine, and were so cautiously worded as to baffle all attempts at extracting a meaning from them. I required a candid judgment from Mr. Nalder's successors, but could gain nothing more than that the operations of the law were so uncertain, that it would be imprudent to decide upon the probabilities of an event. They hoped I should succeed, and I might depend upon it that nothing on their parts should be wanting. As I had neither faith nor hope in the business, I determined at once to bring it to a close, and with that view went directly to Mr. Bearblock to propose that a cessation of hostilities should instantly take place between us. Mr. Bearblock talked in a high style of his honesty and integrity, but I interrupted him by saying, that they had nothing to do in the present chancery suit, and again urged my offers of peace. Bearblock attached a trifling preliminary, being nothing more than that I should pay all costs and charges whatsoever, and compliment him with the sum of one thousand pounds for his trouble, and the like sum as a compensation for the attack upon his character.

This was too much for me, and I opened upon him a volley of abuse, saying among other things that I had positive proofs of his peculation, and as he was so nice about his character, I would spend the last shilling in exposing him to the world, and obliging him to refund his ill-gotten gains. The lawyer's perturbations proved that my charge against him, although made at random was well founded. We gradually receded, I from my passion, and he from his demands, so that by the time I had got tolerably cool, Mr. Bearblock agreed to the destruction of all the papers on both sides upon a mutual release.

This was done, I then collected all my title deeds, together with my other papers of consequence, and deposited them in an iron chest, which I sent for security to my bankers. If I exceeded my income one year I knew that I must retrench the next. I had no idea of saving, for I had no one on whom my saving could devolve. If I lived within my means I determined that the surplus should be devoted to the improvement of my different places of residence. The old steward of the Erpingham estate I continued in his situation. Time had proved him to be trust-worthy. I added the management of the Bingwood property to his other employment, thus leaving to myself nothing but the trouble of receiving the money, and of examining the accounts whenever I thought proper so to do.

CHAP. XII.IMPROVEMENTS.

BY degrees the remembrance of Lydia had almost ceased to agitate me, but my heart was still proof against an attachment of a similar description. The mind, however, must feed upon something and upon the retiring of one passion must yield itself to another. For several years my attention was directed to the pursuit of trifles. I had no inclination for shew and splendour; but as I had money that I knew not how to employ, I furnished my houses both in town and country in a most costly manner, and thought myself richly repaid for the enormous expence, by the encomiums which were bestowed upon them. I had no taste for reading, but my libraries might vie with the most celebrated in the country, if not in the actual value of the books, at least in the cost of the binding. The splendid coverings which I had bestowed on the meanest works would have rendered them an ornament either to the Bodleian or to the British Museum. The contents, as I never read them, were of little importance, and it is a chance that the imposition would have been ever detected, if my bookseller, like his brother in the trade who supplied one of Catherine of Russia's illiterate favourites, had charged me for cheese-mongers rubbish, superbly bound and lettered with the names of celebrated authors, the same price as if it had been in reality the works they professed to be.

But nothing was made to last for ever. My houses were completed according to the most tasteful designs, and what was a greater rarity, every thing was actually paid for. The sums which I had yearly bestowed on the Caxtons and other black letter publications, on ancient manuscripts which no one could decipher, and other works of literary rarity, were more than sufficient to answer the lessened demand. I had exhausted all the book collectors in the kingdom, and began to despair of swelling out my catalogue of useless lumber to any great extent. I had no other criterion to judge of the value of a book than the price it cost me, and the same article for which I would have refused to have given a shilling, I have purchased for fifty pounds. An instance of this kind, by the bye, rather put me out of conceit with my literary pursuits. One day in my travels in search of rare works, I stopped at a small stall, and observed a small book, in old English character, which I never had patience to read much less to understand. I looked at the covers with the utmost eagerness, and was convinced it was a work of real value until the bookseller, seeing my eagerness, asked me eighteen pence. It was now of no worth ; I laid it down, and went away. I had no sooner got home than one of the black letter tribe from whom I had made frequent purchases offered me an invaluable treasure for only one hundred and twenty pounds. It was, he said, the celebrated treatise on the game of chess, and the first book which Caxton could be proved to have printed in the English language. It was, he allowed, deficient in the title page, and in the last two or three leaves, but was otherwise complete. It struck me that I had seen the book before, but I could not recollect where ; however, I did not in the least question the veracity of the seller. As it was not sold by public auction I thought I might as well try to obtain an abatement, and accordingly offered one hundred pounds, but on the assurance that Sir Solomon Muddlethick had insisted upon the refusal at one hundred and ten pounds, I cheerfully paid the extended sum, and received the treasure in exchange for my draft. The seller whom I knew under the appellation of Mr. Cobweb was met as he withdrew from the library, by a brother antiquarian to whom with great glee I showed my new purchase. My friend looked at it for a few minutes with a smile, which I attributed to satisfaction, but without any circumlocution he told me that he had seen Cobweb buy the indentical book that morning at a stall in Piccadilly for twopence, and that it was neither more nor less than an old act of parliament, which from the condition of the leaves at the beginning and the end appeared to have been recently mutilated.

It may be easily imagined that I was proof against similar temptations, but as my money accumulated faster than I could spend it, I began to be listless and unhappy. It was of no use to refurbish my houses, and I did not see that any thing was left for me, but to rebuild them. Erpingham castle, noble as it was, could not boast of Grecian elegance. It was of a mixture, as I was told, of the Gothic, Saracenic, and half a score other styles, whose names I have forgotten. The effect was, indeed, grand to a degree, but it was not Grecian, and Grecian I resolved it should be.

I sent for a celebrated architect, but all his ideas were gothic. He was so completely absorbed with pointed arches, as almost to deny the existence of the graceful curve. My house was gothic enough already. I had set myself up as a man of taste, and could not therefore admit the propriety of any opinion that did not exactly coincide with my own. With another architect I was more fortunate; Mr. Portico had a classic taste in every respect, but he was a man of such instability of disposition that no dependence whatever could be placed on him. He had commenced the building of numberless houses, but had never been known to finish one. His genius and abilities were, however, undoubted, and the grandeur of his designs had elevated him to the foremost rank in his profession.

After several ineffectual attempts to engage Mr. Portico to accompany me to Erpingham for the purpose of viewing the site of the intended mansion, preparatory to his entering upon the designs, and my patience being almost exhausted, for I found my money accumulate at a rate which made me uneasy, I was determined to take possession of Mr. Portico by force. With this view I drove to his house in my travelling equipage, and requested the favour of speaking to Mr. Portico for a moment before I left town. I declined alighting being in a hurry—Mr. Portico entered the carriage, having, as he stated, left the Marquis of Enro in waiting for him. I gave the noble Marquis an opportunity of waiting his own time, for on the signal agreed upon the door of the carriage was closed, and the horses were on the full gallop towards Erpingham. Mr. Portico remonstrated, he prayed, he promised—if I would only return for a quarter of an hour, he would attend me. He had no hat, no linen, not even a pencil nor scrap of paper. All this, I told him, might be procured on the road. Mr. Portico seeing that I was resolved, withdrew his objections, and gave way to an unusual flow of spirits. By the time we reached Erpingham Mr. Portico had forgotten the Marquis, and seemed in no hurry to return.

After Mr. Portico had viewed the house and grounds he gave me his opinion in a very few words, and those by the bye, not of the most palatable description. He coolly said, that the man must be a fool who would pull down such a noble place to make room for a gewgaw, which no management upon the face of the earth could adapt to our unkind and uncertain climate.

It is needless to say that I willingly parted with Mr. Portico. I made him a handsome compliment for his time and trouble, and took leave of him with evident marks of dissatisfaction. But Mr. Portico was a man of too much consequence to feel any thing discompose him. He returned directly to town, and, I understood exposed me as a laughing stock in all directions. I afterwards understood that Mr. Portico had been lately seized with the gothic fever; and like the rest of his brethren, had set about to extol deformity as taste, and to decry beauty and proportion as antiquated notions, beneath the genius of the present wise generation.

I was thoroughly vexed at my disappointment, as the rebuilding of my house would have amused me for several years, and I should then have it to furnish and fit up. I gave up all hopes of it, though with great reluctance, from the conviction that every architect in the kingdom, at least every one of sufficient celebrity to answer my purpose, had been equally gothic bitten with the two great men whom I consulted.

But it is truly fortunate that good and evil are so chequered in the world as to enable every one of common attention to turn from the latter to the former. Naturalists say, that the bane and the antidote are every where inseparable. The most venomous reptiles range in districts which afford a cure for the wounds they inflict, and in like manner there is scarcely an evil, but what, if carefully examined, is not attended with a corresponding good. Now although my house had nothing poisonous about it, I viewed it as if it had, and in all probability should have left it with disgust, and perhaps with a farewell for ever, had I not luckily thought that if I could get nobody to improve the house, I could at least expend my spare cash in the alterations of the grounds.

Mr. Nepton, the great landscape gardener, was at that time engaged in beautifying the park of my neighbour, Lord Viscount Snuffleton. It was on a dead flat, and without a single interesting feature, but Mr. Nepton insisted upon its great capabilities, and asserted that in less than six years, if he were not curtailed in the expence, he would make it the handsomest thing in the kingdom. A great deal had been already done. There was not a drop of water near the place but what was procured from wells of extraordinary depth. But this was no discouragement to the improver. A magnificent lake was excavated, and a mountain formed by its side upon an improved principle. The effect was magical.—Lord Snuffleton was delighted. Here was hill, dale, and a place for water effected in one operation. It was the talk of the whole country. Every body went to see it, and every body came away wondering how my Lord Snuffleton was to make water enough to fill his lake.

There is however hardly an obstacle which it is not in the power of genius to surmount. In due time Snuffleton Park could boast of a fine piece of water, and what was still more extraordinary, of the only volcano in the British empire. Lord Snuffleton embraced the improver with rapture, as they viewed the effect from an attic window. This you see, my lord is harmony, this is what I call following nature; nothing is lost; one ornament naturally springs out of another.

I was highly pleased with the ingenuity of Mr. Nepton, and fully joined in Lord Snuffleton's praise of the transcendant abilities which had contrived to give such beautiful features to what before was little better than a dreary waste. The volcano and the lake were inseparable companions. Had they been married by banns the union could not have been more complete. The fact was that Mr. Nepton had erected his mountain upon a strong building and had made a winding funnel to the top.

Some well diggers of discretion, who had been sworn to secrecy, dug a well of large dimensions, and a steam engine of considerable power was secretly erected which supplied the lake with water and the volcano with smoke.

A long conversation which I had with Mr. Nepton at Lord Snuffleton's determined me to call in his assistance in the embellishment of Erpingham Park, which as it abounded with natural beauties of every description would afford ample scope for the genius of the improver. Mr. Nepton indulged me with a detail of some of his plans for further beautifying Snuffleton Park. The new mountain was to be raised considerably higher and to be divided into three regions, to convey the idea of Mount Ætna. The lower part was to be planted with such shrubs and trees, the produce of a warm climate, as would thrive in England; the second or middle part, was to be decorated with the pine tribe, while he proposed to cover the upper part either with chalk or with some material or other that would retain whitewash, in order that it might have the appearance of perpetual snow, which he was of opinion might be preserved of a decent colour by being whitewashed once a month.

I inquired where he would procure the materials for raising his mountain. He smiled and observed that I could have seen but little of his wonderful improvements, or I should have considered such a question unnecessary. It was only, he said, for him to make up his mind to a thing, and its accomplishment followed as a matter of course.

“ But not to keep your lordship in the dark ; on the spot where we at present stand I intend to excavate a complete Peruvian valley to a very considerable depth, and to wind it in such a way that it may seem to extend to eternity."

"But the water will be always at the bottom, as there can be no vent for it?"

"Certainly, my Lord, I mean to have a standing rivulet, which when it gets above a certain height will discharge itself into the well, and increase the supply for the lake."

"Wonderful!"

"Then, my Lord, I propose to have a Peruvian bridge of ropes, that every body will be afraid of passing."

"But do you not think it likely, that your mountain being artificial will exhibit a natural curiosity, and treat Lord Snuffleton at some future time with an avalanche?"

"Oh, no! my Lord, my mountains are not made in the common way. Where I am called in, my works shall have bid defiance to such things as them. Nature is very well in her way but we can manage matters much better."

Without hesitation I engaged Mr. Nepton to commence operations at Erpiugham. He turned up his nose when I told him that the park had been much admired for its picturesque scenery. I pointed out to him particularly a view from the window of the principal drawing room. He said it was too much; the eye was distracted with too great variety. There was wood and water, a cultivated valley bounded by blue mountains, whose summits touched the clouds. Such a view ought never to be seen from a mansion. It was very well in the course of a walk, but was by no means in unison with the house and grounds.

It was so far fortunate that at the distance of less than a quarter of a mile there was an eminence, which if removed, would effectually exclude the hated objects. After calling in Mr.

Nepton I could not, of course dispute his taste. Giving him therefore the requisite authorities I set off for London, intending not to return to Erpingham until all the improvements were completed, that they might burst at once upon my astonished sight. I cannot say that I much relished the idea of blocking out what I had always looked upon as the most leading feature about the place, but I nevertheless submitted, as the only consequence was, that if I did not like the park as he should think proper to form it, I could with no greater portion of difficulty, bring every thing back into its former state. The operations therefore suggested a two-fold advantage, for it would not only cost me a very considerable sum in the first alteration, but it also held out the prospect of employing as much more in undoing what had been done.

On my return to London I cast my eyes back upon the park from the same spot from whence I had at first viewed it, and proudly fancied that when I again saw it, it would be well worth the journey. My instructions to Mr. Nepton were on no account to spare expence in rendering Erpingham the most perfect residence in the kingdom. Mr. Nepton promised ~~most~~ faithfully to stick to the letter of my instructions, and assured me that I should have no occasion to reproach him with any pimping schemes. There was glorious room, he said, to move about in, and he never should know how to be sufficiently grateful for the opportunity I had thus afforded him for the expansion of his genius, which, he said, had been generally confined by the dreadful want of spirit on the part of the noblemen and gentlemen who had taken advantage of his skill and taste.

CHAP. XIII.

CONNOISSEURSHIP.

AS I could not imagine that my improvements at Erpingham would absorb that part of my income which I could not consume in the regular way, I had to strike out a fresh pursuit, in order to relieve myself from this peculiar species of embarrassment. Thus circumstanced, necessity urged me to become a connoisseur in painting and sculpture. My walls became crowded with pictures, which, as is generally the case, I estimated in proportion to the price they cost me; and every corner of my rooms was crouded with antique vases and mutilated statues.

That I often became the prey of the jackals who hover about and provide food for all those unhappy beings to whom "some demon whispered Visto have a taste," is no matter of wonder. Like most other men of taste, I had no judgment, and was obliged to depend on that of others. Sometimes, however, I was caution itself, but it did not prevent my being imposed upon. I once bought an undoubted Guido for fourteen hundred guineas. It was allowed by every one to be a decided original. To secure my bargain, and to avoid the possibility of a cheat, I wrote my name on the back of the canvass. The picture was hung up in a prominent situation, and was universally admired, until Sir James Daub, who had recently returned from a ten years residence at Rome, pronounced, in a dictatorial manner, that my celebrated Guido was only a copy, and that none of the best. We came to high words upon the subject, and had not my character as a man of courage been fully established by the two duels I had already fought, I should have felt it my duty to have called Sir James to account for the slighting things he thought proper to assert, in opposition to the received opinion of all the connoisseurs in the metropolis.

I parted from Sir James with the most sovereign contempt for his abilities, and expressed my surprize to the person that happened to come next within hearing, that a law was not passed to keep boobies at home, instead of permitting them to expose themselves abroad, and thus bring a disgrace upon their countrymen. The person whom I addressed happened to have been present at the time the purchase was made, and had strenuously urged its claim to originality. But his tone was now changed; and, in defiance of his former assertions, he professed, on a further examination, not only to agree in opinion with Sir James Daub, as to its being an indifferent copy, but also to question whether it was really the picture I had bought. It was removed from its place, and I was fully convinced that my hand-writing was on the back. When I looked again at the parts which were pointed out to me as striking defects, I was shocked at my want of penetration, and yet could not believe that the respectable personages who agreed in their judgment at the time of the sale, would be wilful sharers in the practice of a deception.

The mystery, however, was soon cleared up. The individual picture I had purchased, was again offered for sale. It was recognized by several persons, who called themselves my friends, by some peculiar marks in the principal figure, which had been made by the hand of time. By their advice, I claimed the picture, but was referred to my hand-writing on the canvas of that of which I was then in possession. I have no doubt that I must have submitted to be branded with folly; and that those who had cheated me would have quietly enjoyed the spoil, had not a porter offered, for the sum of ten guineas, to betray the secret. I readily gave it, and was informed, that there were two pictures in the same frame, the original in front, and the copy on which I had written my name in the back.

To prevent an action, which, notwithstanding my abhorrence to law, I was determined to bring, I was offered one thousand guineas back again. This I peremptorily refused, and insisted on the original, or the return of the whole money. The parties chose the former, and I triumphantly displaced the copy, to make room for its master. The sellers stated their case as peculiarly hard, having already paid the porter, who divulged the secret, no less, at different times, than seventy pounds, to secure his secrecy, and yet the rascal had at last sold them for ten guineas. I gave them a long lecture upon honesty, with more than my usual eloquence. Whether or not it had the effect I intended, is more than I can say, as the transaction sickened me of dealing in antiquity. For I suspected, that with half my originals, for which I had given immense sums, I might have been played the same trick.

In order to avoid a similar occurrence, I resolved to transfer my patronage from the dead to the living; and patriotically to bestow all possible encouragement upon the talents of my native country. I know not, however, how it happened, but in lieu of attending to my own countrymen, I was imperceptibly led towards foreigners who were settled in England. I bought several pictures, at an extravagant rate, of a German artist, whom I invited frequently to my house, and strongly recommended to all my acquaintance. But on my declining to pay five hundred guineas for a miserable daub, I found myself, within a week, caricatured in every print shop, under the form of a hog, which was designated the British Mecænas. On another occasion, an Italian artist, to whom I had given two thousand guineas for a painting, which had been exhibited and cried up as a most masterly production, sent it me home rolled round a piece of wood. I was a good deal exasperated, but contrived to keep my temper for a short time, contenting myself with civilly sending for the frame. The rascal had the impudence to send me back word, that I had bought the picture, and not the frame, which was worth ten times the amount of the former.

This was too much ; in my rage I set off to the painter, taking in my hand a cudgel of no mean size, with which, the moment he came within my reach, I broke his head and the peace at the same instant. After taking ample vengeance on every part of his carcass, I advised him to be more cautious for the future. The same evening I was conducted to Bow Street, and held to bail for the assault. My gentleman was desirous of compromising the business ; but I gloried too much in the act to lose the opportunity of exposing him on a public trial.

In return, as he seemed fond of law, I brought an action to recover the frame of the picture, insisting that I had bought the whole as it then hung. Both actions were tried. In the first I was cast, with a farthing damages ; and in the latter I obtained a verdict in my favour, the jury having thought proper, contrary to the judge's opinion, to consider that the frame in all cases formed a part of the picture.

I had here the satisfaction of having ample vengeance. The country became too hot to hold the painter, and I understand that he subsequently felt the weight of a cudgel in return for his insolence, more than once.

These circumstances, however, wholly estranged me from all further purchases of paintings. My walls lost nothing by the change of my opinions for they were already so crowded, that to have hung up another picture of great price, I must in all probability have displaced one of the same value.

Sculpture was still left me, for I had made it hitherto a minor consideration, and when I devoted my attention almost exclusively to it, there was but little scope for expenditure. I once entertained the design of applying to the Turkish government, for permission to remove entirely the Parthenon at Athens, with the intention of again erecting it in some prominent part of the metropolis, at my own expence. But this idea I abandoned partly from the great difficulty of the undertaking, and partly because I learnt that a nobleman had forestalled me, and had pillaged it of some of its most valuable ornaments.

On my collection of antique sculpture, however, I attached a peculiar importance. I was in the possession of some undoubted works of Phidias and Praxitiles, but as my historical knowledge was not of a very extensive nature, I was frequently the dupe of assertions, which carried the grossest falsehoods upon the face of them. I purchased three busts as undoubted originals, which I was told had been presented by the Persian Philosopher Zoroaster to Martin Luther as a testimony of his esteem and regard.

An infringement upon the laws of chronology in such matters is of little or no consequence. I was thoroughly satisfied with my treasures, and firmly convinced that they were in reality what they professed to be. As I have said that the laws of chronology in such cases need not be strictly regarded, I may as well anticipate my story as far as regards these precious instances of the philosopher's esteem. Being in want of ready cash I some years afterwards sold my whole collection of antiquities to an eminent virtuoso in the lump; it is not, therefore, in my power to say at what these precious relics were specifically rated. But I subsequently understood that the collection had been dispersed on the decease of the person to whom I had sold it.

As I was in the habit of putting a private mark upon the several articles, I could at any time recognize such as had been in my possession. These individual busts, however, I discovered not many months since again offered for sale at a public room in Holborn, not indeed, as the present of the Persian, but “as three antique busts of Greek sculpture, formerly placed in the Vatican by Alexander the Great, presented by the pope to Cardinal Wolsey, and purchased by the present proprietor at the dissolution of his, (the Cardinal’s) palace at Esher!!”

I have copied the advertisement as it appeared in the Observer newspaper. I found that I was not the only fool in the world, and that Zoroaster and Martin Luther were as likely to be contemporaneous as Alexander the Great and the Vatican, or as the present proprietor of the busts, with the dissolution of Cardinal Wolsey’s palace at Esher. I have not learnt who was the happy purchaser, but I sincerely trust, that such invaluable and inestimable specimens of the arts, will not be suffered to slumber in the cabinet, nor nod upon the book-case of a selfish collector.

In the midst of my career of purchasing equestrian statues without the horses, and complete figures with only the legs or arms, and sometimes the heads wanting, I received the following letter from my steward at Erpingham, relative to the improvement which Mr. Nepton was making in the park, but which the good old steward chose to view in a different light.

“ My Lord,

“ My duty to your Lordship lays me under the necessity of troubling you upon a point, which is to be sure rather out of my way, seeing that I have no right whatever to dispute, or even to call in question the propriety of any orders your Lordship may think proper to give, but I hope your Lordship will excuse the liberty I take in saying that Mr. Nepton is spoiling all the park and making it neither fit for man nor beast, seeing that he had buried all the good soil and turned up a rank yellow clay that wont even bear a weed. Besides all this he has moved all the hill on the east side of the house, and exposed all the dirty cottages in Lousy Corner to be seen from every window in front of the house ; and your Lordship knows that there is not such a nasty place as Lousy Corner in the whole county ; and I'll venture to say, that it will be full twenty years before it can be planted out. Mr. Nepton says, that its by your Lordship's orders, that the view of Middleton Vale is blocked out from the house, which, begging your Lordship's pardon, I can hardly believe, seeing that the view from the house that way is called the prettiest thing in the kingdom. I can hardly think that your Lordship is aware of half the mischief Mr. Nepton is doing, and therefore hope, seeing that I have but a few years to live, that Erpingham park, which is the pride of the country, will not be spoiled in my time.

I have the honour to remain,

My Lord, your Lordship's

Very faithful, and most

Obedient Servant,

GEOFFREY GANDER."

I entertained a high opinion of old Gander's integrity, but I thought he had moved out of his sphere in placing his taste in opposition to that of so celebrated a man as Mr. Nepton. It was to all intents and purposes the cobbler getting beyond his last. I should certainly have expressed my displeasure towards the old man had it not been for "Lousy Corner," which, notwithstanding the taste and judgment of Mr. Nepton was past all bearing. However I might have agreed with the improver, as to the propriety of blocking out beautiful objects, I could not by any means agree with him, in exposing to view a collection of hovels more resembling a Hottentot kraal, than the habitation of civilized beings.

I thought I had too much at stake to neglect the information of Gander, and accordingly proceeded to Erpingham to get rid of Lousy Corner at all events. Mr. Nepton in my absence had made astonishing alterations, but my taste was not sufficiently modernized to approve of them. But it struck me that this deficiency might have proceeded from my indulgence in the productions of earlier days. Mr. Nepton exhibited his drawings of Erpingham park as it had been, and Erpingham park as it would be. The difference was unquestionably great. The past and future would not admit of a comparison, and I was gothic enough to plainly assert, in the presence of the improver, that he had positively spoilt my park.

This was worse than sacrilege. Mr. Nepton instantly gave admission to black choler in all its various forms, insisted upon the immediate payment of his usual charges for time and trouble, and contemptuously left me to mar his works as I pleased. I did so, and directed Gander again to hide Lousy Corner, and open the view to Middleton Vale.

On the whole I had no reason to complain of disappointment. A good portion of money had been consumed, and I was thoroughly satisfied that it was beyond the power of art, to add to the beauty and grandeur of the spot, which my forefathers had adorned with the choicest gifts of art, in addition to those of nature, which it already possessed. I much regretted the loss of some venerable oaks, which were among the greatest ornaments to the place, and which were sacrificed to Mr. Nepton's schemes for substituting deformity for beauty. I was ready to acknowledge the genius of Mr. Nepton upon a flat surface, and had Erpingham park been upon a flat, I should, I doubt not, have compounded even for a volcano, if in consequence of it I could have procured an extensive lake. But Erpingham and Snuffleton parks had no feature in common between them, and the same genius which had embellished the latter could only ruin the beauty of the former.

I was ultimately sickened in my connoisseurship by the ridicule which my taste excited among the spectators. To prevent the ill-natured remarks in the public papers, I stopped the exhibition of my houses for a time, but I soon re-opened them, as I discovered that the only gratification which I felt, arose from the envy which my possessions created in the breast of others.

CHAP. XIV.PRECEDENCE.

IT is not to be supposed, circumstanced as I was, in the possession of the glittering ornaments of life, that I steered clear of the match making matrons whose endeavours are always upon the alert to provide for one sex at the expence of the other. The Earl of Erpingham, rich, young and handsome, was too capital a prize to be uncontested. The worthy parents of unmarried daughters were profuse in their civilities to myself, and in commendation of the unrivalled beauty and goodness of their respective offspring. It was a pity, I was often told, that so ancient and honourable a family should be prevented from having any further portion in the annals of time. The distant branches of the house of Erpingham, I was reminded, were all extinct, and the noble property at present attached to the title would go the lord knows where.

My French valet (for since my becoming a virtuoso, I had again discarded Giles to the superintendence of the stable,) observed to me one day, while I was dressing, "What an ornament Miss Muggleworm would be to a coronet!" The lady in question had an immense fortune in expectation, as well as a considerable portion of black blood in possession, both of which her father was determined to bestow on nobility. Mr. Muggleworm was among the first planters who settled at Demarara, and who in the course of a few years had amassed a modern plum, or somewhere about half a million of money, all of which the father was ready to expend in the purchase of honours for the daughter of one of his black slaves. What my page of the back stairs received for his interest upon this occasion, I know not, but I apprehend he was too much of a courtier to barter his time and trouble for nothing. However, I had already more money than I knew how to employ, Miss Muggleworm was therefore consigned to another market.

My numerous acquaintances likewise favoured me with their advice in the choice of a wife. A noble duke who had recently married his cook-maid, advised me by all means to match with my equals. "None but those," his grace added, "who had noble blood in their veins, could possibly know how to support the requisite degree of dignity." A viscount who had been just united to the wealthy heiress of a jew broker, told me that love alone could render the marriage state happy, and that he wondered how any one could be meanly swayed by interested motives in the choice of a companion for life.

I manfully withstood all attacks upon my personal liberty, however well directed, so long as I could derive either employment or amusement from my houses, and from the alterations in in my park. Mr. Nepton's improvements sickened me of interfering with nature, and as to art I had completely exhausted it. Not that I intend by any means to infer that I had reached the acme of perfection, but I wish it merely to be understood that my houses were so completely crammed with productions of all descriptions, there was no room for the admission of any additional article without displacing something, perhaps, which equalled it in every point, novelty excepted.

As I never possessed any inclination for study, and was not incumbered with more ideas than were necessary to carry on the common occupations of life, a cessation from the avocations which had hitherto filled up my time left me for a while a prey to idleness. The organ of philoprogenitiveness which had been so long dormant in my brain, or as Dr. Spurzheim will have it, in my pericranium, on a sudden started into action. I began to feel a desire of handing down my possessions to posterity. Marriage was a necessary step, and I seldom contemplated it without heaving a sigh or two in remembrance of Lydia. But my time hung heavily upon my hands, and I conceived that a wife would amuse me when in good humour, and keep me at least awake when either of us happened to be in a bad one. — Besides I flattered myself that the Countess of Erpingham's superb establishments would excite no small share of the public attention. I was perfectly aware that the husband of a woman of fashion is little better than a nonentity ; but I saw so many of my acquaintances who bore their lot without repining, that I was inclined to believe that it was no great hardship. Love, in any connexion I might form, was out of the question. I never expected to labour again under the influence of that passion. All I required, or hoped for, was that the mother of my children should be a credit to myself.

I sought in all directions for a desirable match. I was not particularly nice in my choice, but I soon found the extreme difficulty of fixing where the heart had no interest. I was not even solicitous for beauty, but I was desirous that the person to whom I united myself should neither be deformed nor disagreeable. Fortune was not essential, but a wife's portion, as my estates were so strictly entailed, would go towards a provision for younger children, beyond what I was empowered to charge upon my property. Lady Elizabeth Ducksfoot the only daughter to the Earl of Wildgoose appeared to be eligible in every respect; but I was unfortunately witness to a most unpardonable neglect on the part of her woman, who regardless of her lovely mistress' charms, had permitted three carrotty hairs to stray from under the flaxen ringlets. Matters had considerably advanced, through the medium of an eminent dowager, who made match-making her principal business, towards perfecting the arrangements with the Honourable Lucretia Pepperwell, sole heiress of Lord Clovebury, an East Indian Nabob. But they were suspended by the sudden elopement of Lucretia with a Cornet in the Guards, of whom I never heard any thing remarkable, except that he had the highest instep of any man in England.

I had several other offers under consideration, but my matrimonial schemes were put aside by an approaching general election. The parliament was on the point of dying a natural death, and I became afresh a personage of vast importance with both sides of the present house. The members returned by my father were in the ministerial interest, and, as I afterwards learnt, for the most cogent reasons. For want of a sufficient motive, I might have been induced to leave the party in power in full possession of the influence they had long enjoyed, and that without any regard to profit; but a quarrel happening to arise between my coachman and the coachman of one of the secretaries of state, as to who should back in a narrow lane where it was impossible to pass, determined me to espouse the cause of opposition.

A thing of far less importance formerly set all Europe in a flame ; for I certainly think, that an Earl of nearly the oldest creation, and a minister of state, were fully equal, in point of consequence, to Mrs. Masham and her glove. In the regular progress of such a rencounter, it would have been incumbent upon the party who were nearest to an opening, to have backed. But the distances appeared so exactly equal, that it was next to impossible to decidẽ, without an actual measurement. The coachmen were satisfied with judging by the eye, and seemed to agree, that as far as distance went, they might as well settle the business of precedence by the toss up of a halfpenny. The secretary's coachman haughtily pleaded his Lords' high office ; mine as pertinaciously referred to the peerage book, and maintained that an

Earl any how must be superior to a baron. Neither of them appeared to have the least disposition to yield.

The secretary and myself sat quietly for some time, but at last I grew impatient, as I was fearful of being too late to see a collection of waxwork, which was about to be packed up for the continent. I therefore got out of my carriage, and walked quietly to the place of my destination; while the noble secretary, who had nothing but the affairs of the nation to claim his attention, resolutely kept his post, notwithstanding he had been summoned to a cabinet council, expressly called to take into consideration a new uniform for the life-guards. My coachman stoutly kept his position, and returned late at night with his horses, having left the vehicle to maintain my dignity. The noble secretary then retreated, leaving my carriage to be taken care of by the mob, who kindly stripped it of every thing moveable, and then dragged it off to the Green Yard.

I never had the slightest intercourse with the nobleman in question. But his conduct on this occasion was not to be forgiven. To show my opinion of the insult, I went the following evening to the House of Lords for the first time, and voted on every division with the minority. I then openly handed my proxy to the leader of the opposition party. To show further my indignation, I caused it to be publicly announced, that I had settled an annuity on the coachman, in token of my approbation of his spirited behaviour.

The Premier waited upon me early the next morning. His noble colleague acquainted him with the unfortunate transaction, and had commissioned him to make every reparation. No one could more seriously lament the unhappy misunderstanding than his noble friend. He would discharge his coachman. He would make the rascal apologize to my coachman. He would meet me at any time I would appoint, at the same spot, and in the presence of whoever I chose, would immediately pull off his hat to me, and direct his coachman to back his horses. In short, he would give me any satisfaction in any way I desired.

I told the Premier that I had no complaint to make which required redress. I had acted from conviction, and had made up my mind, upon due deliberation, as to the course I considered it my duty to pursue. The country, I should take the liberty of telling him, had been miserably governed. There was a shameful abuse of the public money, and a total want of energy in the party in power. This, I told him, was a time of national embarrassment, and not one for the multiplication of places and pensions; and for increasing the salary of places already in existence. I concluded by observing, that it behoved every thinking man to examine calmly into the best mode of effecting the public good.

My patriotism evaporated before the minister had re-entered his carriage; but it was contrary to my maxims to recede when I had once advanced. If it had not been so, I should have done it in the present instance, for I foresaw the trouble that a perseverance in the sentiments I had adopted would bring upon me.

The Premier had taken his leave in a haughty tone, and the newspapers represented him to have said, in the House of Commons, the same evening, “that the honourable Gentlemen, on the other side of the house, had, perhaps, reason to complain of mismanagement; for that half of the embarrassments of the country had arisen from the government having been thwarted in their attempts for the public welfare, by the imbecility of those on whom fortune had devolved considerable influence, which had been exerted according to the dictates of folly and caprice, to the real prejudice of the state."

This was too plain to be mistaken. Had it not been for this strong personal allusion, I might have been coaxed into neutrality; but passion now plunged me within the vortex of party; and I became one of the most strenuous supporters of the anti-ministerialists.

The outs replaced the ins in my three boroughs. I attended personally to the business, and in my own name requested the pleasure of the several corporations to dine with me, in order to proceed to the election of the several burgesses. From habit, they had never enquired who was to be the new member, till the day of election, when a good dinner was an ample compensation for their votes, and all, except perhaps some trifling favours from myself, that they could ever expect for their subserviency.

But the grand stake was the county. My influence was considerable, but was not of itself sufficient to prevent a contest. My pride here operated with its utmost force, and I was determined to succeed in my nomination by all human means. The popular candidates, that is, the parties in hopes of places, were vigorously canvassed for by the people about me, in opposition to the parties in possession of place. To crown the whole, I liberally undertook, in support of my influence, to defray all the expences of the election. My agents caught the spirit of liberality, and caused houses of entertainment to be opened in every part of the county, on the simple condition of gauging the inside of the several houses, and paying for the contents in ale, in lieu of the trouble of keeping a score.

A disgraceful scene of riot and confusion was terminated at the usual time, by a majority of seven votes on the side of the cause which I had espoused. Nothing could exceed the tumultuous joy with which the orange heroes congratulated me on the result of the pole.

The ministerial candidates petitioned against the return. It would have been dishonourable in me to have abandoned my new friends, and I still made myself responsible for all the expences of opposing the petition. A strict scrutiny took place, and the committee, after an investigation which lasted three months, declared that the sitting members were not duly elected, and that the other candidates should have been returned.

My chagrin on this unexpected termination of my political labours was not a little augmented, at finding myself nearly one hundred and fifty thousand pounds in debt.

The whole extent of my obligations to my coachman was now before me. He had maintained his master's dignity with a vengeance. The urgency of the demands for payment were only equalled by my total inability to comply with them. I could neither mortgage nor sell; and to make retrenchments to that amount, seemed utterly impossible. If Miss Muggleworm, with her large monied property, had again presented herself to me, I should not have hesitated a moment, but should have placed the money against the black blood, and quietly made a bargain of both.

To have got rid of my daily duns, I would have made a Countess of a cinder wench. Intreaties for payment were succeeded by threats, in case of refusal; and I was reminded of my pictures, library, and furniture, and was led to understand the nature of executions. Nothing could relieve me from embarrassment but a rich wife; and to matrimony I was reluctantly forced to direct my whole attention.

CHAP. XV.CORDIALITY.

THE respective merits of the several heiresses at present in the market, were duly canvassed; but none of them could enter into competition with the eldest daughter of the late Sir Joseph Broad, on whom his very extensive estates exclusively devolved, as well as a very considerable sum of money, which had accumulated during a long minority, under a guardian of a description somewhat different to those who had fulfilled the same office to me. With the rest of the unmarried part of the higher circles, I put in my claim for distinction, feeling that if I succeeded, all my difficulties must instantly vanish. It was true, that my income in itself was sufficiently large, when once cleared from incumbrances, to have supported a wife in the first style of affluence and splendour ; but the high opinion I entertained of Miss Broad's superior merits, was by no means lessened by her possessing more than I actually wanted.

The suitors were numerous beyond conception ; and were, in fact, so urgent in sustaining their several claims, that the mother of the heiress, Lady Charlotte Broad, was under the necessity of engaging a secretary, and an additional porter. Hardly a day passed without an increase to their number ; and Miss Broad could reckon among her pretenders, bachelors and widowers of every rank in life, from the B——d R——l to an Irish fortune hunter.

My rank was my passport, and my introduction a matter of course. Without any circumlocution, I made an offer of my hand to Lady Charlotte, who soon gave me to understand that my proposals were highly acceptable to herself. The alliance was also highly approved by the honourable Mr. Datchet, her ladyship's brother, who kindly promised to exert his influence in my behalf. I thought myself on sure grounds, as nothing was wanting but the consent of the young lady herself, which, as I expected it to follow as a natural event, I had never thought of obtaining. I did not, indeed, think it possible for any unmarried woman to have refused the Earl of Erpingham, particularly when his cause was espoused by the nearest connexions of the lady herself. But Miss Broad, although not perhaps at years of discretion, had nevertheless attained that period of life when pillage ceases in the natural course.

She expressed her determination either to chuse for herself, or to be guided by the opinion and judgment of her Abigail.

To my regret I found, that although I had secured the mother and the uncle, I was every whit as far removed from the goal. The Abigail was stedfastly in the interest of a Mr. Evenington, while the lady herself was supposed to lean towards Lord Ballintemple. Both these gentlemen were of noble stocks, indigenious of the sister kingdom, and were amply blessed with the modesty of deportment so peculiar to the natives of that happy land.

I was, however, never thoroughly satisfied of having adopted a wrong mode of proceeding, until one day having accidentally met Mr. Evenington opposite to Lady Charlotte's house, I observed him pull off his hat, and make a most profound bow. This rather astonished me, as I knew that none of the heads of the family were in town. But the tails of the family were equally deserving of Mr. Evenington's regard, at least they equally experienced it, as the object of his present attention was no less a personage than the under-kitchen maid, who was taking the fresh air at the garret window. Mr. Evenington evidently noticed my surprise, for he mentioned, in the course of our conversation, that although it might be possible to say who had influence in that house, it was utterly impossible to say who had not, or who might not, at some future time, attain it.

As I clearly saw that I had no talents for negotiating in the servants' hall, I was, in a short time, induced to leave the field to be disputed between these sons of Erin. I had manfully maintained my post by the side of Lady Charlotte, but I found the citadel had been so mined and countermined, and the outworks carried in a style of such superior generalship, that I utterly despaired of success. Lady Charlotte harangued upon perseverance, but I plainly perceived that perseverance was useless.

The two heroes called upon me one morning, to ask an explanation of my intentions with regard to the lady ; declaring, that if one of them was not the happy man, the lady must hereafter be contented with leading apes.

I was not to be intimidated into a renunciation, but nevertheless waved my pretensions, under the conviction that my further efforts would be fruitless ; but I could not help observing the strangeness of that cordial co-operation which appeared to exist between two persons on so delicate a point, especially as one of them was allowed to have made some impression upon the lady's inclination. I was not permitted to remain any great length of time in suspense, for Mr. Evenington let me, confidentially, into the secrets of the prison house. He and his friend, he said, had not yet decided who should marry the lady, but as I, who was their most formidable opponent, was now out of the question, it was proper that it should be settled. If I would favour them with a dice-box, they would arrange matters without further loss of time. Fortune adjudged the prize to Evenington. His lordship was to receive a stipulated sum out of the ready money, but was to yield as a man of honour, every assistance in his power. I congratulated Mr. Evenington on his success, but he made very light of it, saying that it would make very little difference to him, having hedged himself so completely by betting, as to leave it a matter of doubt, under all the circumstances of the case, and considering that he was to be tied up for life, whether he was in reality a gainer or not.

Both the gentlemen complimented me, with the assurance of their high regard for my judgment. They were aware how much I had been favoured with the good wishes of Lady Charlotte, and would therefore take the liberty of soliciting my advice as to the best mode to be adopted, in order to remove all further opposition on the part of the mother.

I declined interference in any shape, declaring that such amiable friends could better suggest the means of accomplishing their point than any stranger. They had, I told them, already shewn that fertility of invention, which convinced me that nothing could eventually mar their projects.

In a few days the newspapers, under the head of police reports, informed the public, that a duel had been prevented, as it was on the eve of taking place, in consequence of a challenge which Mr. Evenington had sent to Lord Ballintemple. The parties were taken upon the ground, but all the pistols were fired in the air. What the motive of this was I could never ascertain ; but I heard it hinted at the time, that it was to prevent any examination as to the way in which the instruments of death were loaded. From what I had myself seen, I was rather inclined to give credit to the report ; contemplating the duel to be neither more nor less than a ruse de guerre. The parties were, however, bound over to preserve that peace, which I apprehended they never intended to break, farther than by a certain number of explosions on each side. Mr. Evenington either was, or pretended to be, furious at the interruption, and perhaps with just reason, as a discovery of the real state of the business might prejudice rather than forward his cause. If oaths of vengeance would have annihilated the meddling informer, he would not have marred another duel on this side of eternity. The public part of the affair was soon terminated, and the private part was closed by Lord Ballintemple giving up all claims to the lady's affections. The nuptials of Mr. Evenington with the lady herself soon followed.

“None but the brave deserve the fair.” The confidence of Mr. Evenington, as far as the duel was concerned, was sacredly preserved. Could Miss Broad do too much for the hero who was ready to bleed in her cause? Was it likely that Miss Broad, deserted by all her allies, and by her favoured swain, could withstand the united attacks of her waiting-maid, and of the valorous champion. “No man,” says somebody, “was ever a hero to his valet de chambre,” and whatever may be the strength of a woman's mind, it must bend to the influence of a designing Abigail.

As I was decidedly averse to the trouble of courting the mistress through the medium of the maid, I almost despaired of extricating myself by fortune-hunting. But it happened to me, as it happens frequently when the pursuit has ceased ; the desired object will come within the grasp, of its own accord. A direct offer was made to me by the nobleman who had acted as guardian to the three daughters of the late Lord Vavasour. The family had accompanied the conqueror from Normandy ; and their pride was fully equal to their antiquity. The two elder sisters had been graced with ducal coronets ; and I do not imagine that I should have been honoured with the notice of the third, had there remained an unmarried duke or marquis, or even an earl of an older creation than myself.

A subdivision of the property had recently been made between these co-heiresses, in which the two elder sisters had taken to the landed property, while the personals, and some large accumulations were allotted as the portion of the future Countess of Erpingham.

I acceded to the offer, without ever seeing my future bride. If I had, I should, in all probability, have declined the proffered honour. Personal charms, in any eminent degree, I could have easily dispensed with; but there was an air of settled arrogance and unbending pride, which seized the beholder with frigidity, and positively forbade a near approach. Formality never had a more bigotted votary; and I verily believe she would have submitted to be burnt to death, like a monarch of Spain, if the proper attendant had not been by to have assisted her removal.

I had the power of making ample settlements upon both the Erpingham and Bingwood estates. Little difficulty occurred in the arrangements, for I left them entirely at the discretion of the lady's friends. In the marriage settlement there appeared to be many clauses which I had never before heard of. An extensive and exclusive establishment was insisted upon with an attention to minutia, even to the proportionate number of scullions. The whole of the Erpingham property was conveyed to trustees, during the natural term of my life with the benefit, however, of survivorship, to provide for her ladyship's state and dignity. Her inclinations alone were to guide her in the choice of her places of residence. In short, she was in every respect to be without controul.

I only wonder that it was not stipulated that I should be chained up like a house dog.

As there were no knotty points to be discussed, the lawyers soon made an end of their labours, and the day appointed for the ceremony at last arrived. For the first time, I came into contact with my new bride, as I led her from the altar to the carriage. The hand was then given in a way which served to remind me of its extreme value. Lady Erpingham was certainly right in her estimation of it, for I declare it to be the dearest thing I ever purchased in my life. But it was useless to complain; the fetters were of my own choosing, and if they galled me, I had no one but myself to blame.

The ceremony over, the happy pair as the newspapers expressed it, (which by the bye, in my circumstances was thoroughly libellous), with their respective suits, immediately left town in six coaches and four, for their magnificent seat at Erpingham.

Marriages they say are made in heaven. I am certain mine must have been, for I do not think it was concluded through the intervention of any human power. My mind, however, for a time was at ease. My debts were all paid, and I was again clear from all incumbrances except those which I had lately brought upon myself. The comfort and happiness I felt at the discharge of my embarrassments, I endeavoured to fancy were occasioned by a growing attachment to Lady Erpingham, but the deception soon wore away, leaving me in no manner of doubt as to the real state of my sentiments. I was in the situation of a person who had contemplated what he supposed to be a glass of delicious wine, and by taste discovered it to be tincture of senna.

Lady Erpingham had few personal charms to boast of, but this, as I have before observed, I did not consider of consequence. I was not in love with her, and I married her, as she, I imagine, did me, upon a principle of convenience. We had each of us a sufficient degree of merit in the eyes of the other. I must, however, confess myself disappointed; I had plenty of room for esteem, and I did entertain some hope that the Countess would improve upon acquaintance. But her hauteur was excessive, her head was as hollow as a drum, and her heart as cold as a piece of ice. Her whole time was occupied in the correct observance of empty state. The least relaxation from settled and prescribed forms were on no account permitted;—as to cheerfulness it would been an unpardonable offence, and have exposed the unhappy culprit to perpetual banishment, or what was ten thousand times worse, to a succession of gloomy and forbidding looks in her august presence.

The house over-walked with guests of her own inviting, for none of them were capable of running, while those, whom I would willingly have welcomed, were received in silence, and treated with studied indifference.

But notwithstanding all these drawbacks upon amiability, there was one virtue which she carried to an excess. I never heard her utter a complaint. The people about her were made thorough converts to the doctrine of implicit obedience before they had been four and twenty hours in her service. The business of every domestic was allotted, and immediate expulsion was the consequence of an omission. Whether it was voluntary, or involuntary, the result was the same.

As to the guests of her ladyship's inviting, who honoured us with their company, they scrupulously adhered to the prescribed formula. The hour of morning audience, and the hour of dinner were the only times at which her ladyship condescended to mingle in discourse, and to reply to the homage which was offered to her. Her evenings were devoted to the card table, at which she took especial care that no one should intrude, whose rank and consequence was in the slightest degree inferior to her own.

My worthy neighbour Lord Viscount Snuffleton paid me every attention upon my marriage. His nobility procured him a share of Lady Erpingham's notice, but as the great grandfather of the Viscount had been a planter in Virginia, and had accumulated his property by his speculations in tobacco, her ladyship altered her tone, and soon disgusted the Viscount by indecent allusions to, "wretches sprung from a dunghill." She even left off taking snuff declaring to the Viscount, that she could endure nothing that was made from tobacco.

Before the Countess took offence at the Viscount's origin, she had been induced to gratify Snuffleton park with her presence, and to view the volcano, and the lake, protesting, however, in the first instance, that the novelty of the idea was alone sufficient to prevent her from deriving any pleasure from the excursion. But Snuffleton park now smelt of tobacco, and the Viscount was so thoroughly tainted with it, as to become absolutely intolerable to every organ of sense.

Lord Snuffleton remonstrated with me on the treatment he had received, but I could only answer him with a shrug of my shoulders, which was a practice that soon became habitual to me whenever the name of Lady Erpingham was mentioned. It had, indeed, grown upon me so much that I more than once heard strangers enquire whether Lord Erpingham had Saint Vitus's dance, or whether he was only labouring under a simple nervous affection.

CHAP. XVI.CONJUGALITY.

DURING the period usually styled the “Honey Moon,” I exerted myself to keep within the bounds of decorum, and spite of my hasty temperament the month elapsed, without any very remarkable infringement upon the laws of good breeding. But when the moon had left no vestige by which its situation could be traced, differences, for I cannot call them quarrels, began. My passionate disposition was opposed to the cool indifference of a being totally devoid of feeling, and whose conduct was solely guided by her own ideas of propriety, leaving me in point of consequence, not a whit above a negative quality in algebra.

I was consulted in nothing, and the intentions of my wife were frequently discovered to me through the medium of the servants. The arrival of the carriage at the door was often the first intimation I received of her Ladyship's determination to change the place of her residence. I might accompany her if I chose ;—if not, I could easily know, by making enquiries at her bankers, where she was to be found, if I thought proper to join her. Necessity frequently obliged me to take her at her word. I must otherwise have occasionally left business of importance undone, and future arrangements unattended to.

From the hour of my unhappy marriage, I lost all sway in my household. With the exception of my own valet, my orders were never heeded unless they happened not only to be in unison with those of the Countess, but delivered at nearly the same time. In other cases I was told that they received their orders from Lady Erpingham, and knew their business. I once kicked a scoundrel footman, for telling me that he engaged only to obey the orders of Lady Erpingham, and not contented with a personal chastisement, I ventured to complain of his insolence to my wife, and to insist upon his dismissal. Her Ladyship summoned the rascal to answer for himself, but instead of obtaining any redress, I had only the mortification to hear his conduct praised, to see it rewarded, and to be cautioned from again interfering in her domestic arrangements. I lost all patience, and have no doubt that in my passion, I made use of language more remarkable for strength and energy that for delicacy of expression. Her ladyship coolly told me that I was in her apartments, and then rung the bell with more than ordinary violence. I thought it was high time to retreat, being somewhat apprehensive that her ladyship's first orders on the entrance of the servants, would have been to place me at the outside of the door.

I retreated to my study, which was the only place in the house that I could strictly call my own, and in which I passed many melancholy hours. Oh, Lydia! Lydia! how often, in comparing what I was, to what I might have been, have I apostrophized thee! How often cursed the fatal hour which separated us for ever! How often has thy lovely blooming figure visited me in dreams of bliss, and how fatally have my waking thoughts convinced me that my pleasures were delusive—my miseries real.

It may perhaps be expected that I should furnish a catalogue of those glaring faults of which I apparently complain. But I do not charge Lady Erpingham with any. The blame must be attached to Nature, which had sent her into the world with scarcely a grain of sense, and positively without an atom of sensibility. Her behaviour was conformable to our agreement, and strictly virtuous. She neither ridiculed my follies nor blamed any part of my conduct.—If in her eyes I had no perfections, I certainly had no imperfections, for whether I was tranquil or agitated, pleased or displeased, in humour or out of humour, I could perceive no variations in a set of features which were as invariable as a piece of wax work.

But to make amends for some of these disadvantages, I was in every respect master of my own time. Absence, long or short, was unnoticed.—At parting I could discover no signs of regret, nor at meeting could I perceive any marks of joy. I believe that she was as much attached to me as it was in her nature to have been to any one. She had no vices, but on the other hand she was totally deficient in every amiable quality.

Her servants executed her commands and those which emanated directly from her, with fear and trembling, as neither length of service nor proof of attachment afforded excuses for even an involuntary neglect. Dismissal was the inevitable consequence of a departure from duty, but it was unaccompanied with anger. The result of this course of proceedings was such as would naturally be expected. The servants imbibed the emptiness and adopted the formality of the person whom they served, and I dare say that the etiquette of the servant's hall was as disgustingly tiresome as that of the drawing room. The whole of my former house domestics were gradually dismissed, with the exception of the Frenchman, whose affection for his post led him to submit to petty inconveniences, and whose pliant manners enabled him to adapt his behaviour to the class of beings that surrounded him.

The avocations of the Countess were fixed by the motion of the clock. The hour of rest and the hour of rising were equally invariable and equally unaffected by the changes of the seasons. The time allotted for riding (for Lady Erpingham, like the Queen of Spain, had no legs to walk with), for sitting, reading, eating, or playing at cards, were precisely the same on one day as on the day preceding, and the stranger once admitted to Erpingham House, if he liked the sample of one day, might indulge in pleasure to satiety, for he would not have met with any thing that was capable of distracting his attention.

Seneca, in the midst of luxurious enjoyment, harangued upon temperance and moderation, and above every thing praised that equanimity of disposition which alike repels the attacks of pleasure and pain. However much I may admire this philosophy, I certainly envy him more for the style in which he lived, and I am thoroughly satisfied that had Lady Erpingham been Mrs. or Lady Charlotte Seneca, he would have sent his philosophy to Old Nick, and not only have courted pleasure to relieve him from pain, but even have longed for pain to free him from a monotony of pleasure. Lady Erpingham, if she did not suit him would at least have suited his philosophy to a hair; for during the whole of our intercourse I never remember to have seen her countenance clouded with a frown of anger, or brightened with a smile of satisfaction.

With her, pleasure was an indulgence for the multitude, and pain was beneath her dignity. She disdained to communicate either, so far as herself was concerned, and if not averse, was, at all events, incapable of being a partaker in the gratification or uneasiness of others. Being no further selfish than in exacting an implicit compliance with the mode of living she had adopted, she never thwarted the views of others when there was no chance of their clashing with her own. If they were, her fiat was absolute, and from it there was no departure. She had frequently the character for generosity and charity, but I am convinced that she never practised either when refusal would be attended with less trouble and inconvenience than compliance. But let that be as it will, I never heard of any gifts bestowed from inclination, except in instances where her charity would be ostentatiously blazoned in the public prints. In all these it was public approbation and not self approbation which opened her purse strings and induced her to treat alike the deserving and the undeserving, and to proportion her bounty to the medium of praise which the receiver was either able or willing to afford.

Such was Lady Erpingham! Such was the being whom Fate, when he mounted upon my coach-box under the figure of my coachman, had allotted as my partner through the vale of life! Such was the person to whom I had consigned my misery and happiness, and whom I had daily to contrast in my imagination with the only possessor of my heart, the lovely, the fascinating and the affectionate Lydia Berrington.

In this dreadful state of dullness and monotony two years dragged heavily away. The routine of Lady Erpingham was, however, twice broken in upon during that period, by two events of a description common to all classes of life, and from which rank does not always afford an exception. These were no less than the birth of a son and heir in the first year, and of a daughter in the year following. In both instances Lady Erpingham was exposed to considerable inconvenience, for the accouchements took place at the season which her Ladyship had allotted for her residence at Erpingham.

It was so far unlucky that Lady Erpingham, like Mrs. Shandy, had made up her mind to lie-in in London, as the metropolis was deserted by every person of corresponding rank, who could feel, or pretend to feel, an interest in her sufferings. The children as soon as born were consigned to the nursery, and by the time the mother recovered from the effects of bringing them into the world, she had forgotten that they were in existence. As soon as the nature of her situation permitted she returned to Erpingham, whither she was followed by the wet nurse and the infant. At Erpingham an attic was consigned to them, in which they vegetated, as I myself had formerly done, and probably surmounted by neglect what anxiety and care might have rendered fatal. I had hoped that children would have awakened feelings in the mother's breast, which I would willingly have believed were only dormant, and required but an exciting cause to put them into action. But I was mistaken; the soul of Lady Erpingham, if a being devoid of every amiable quality can be said to possess one, was of an unleavened manufacture, in which the passions of every description were completely neutralized.

Tired and thoroughly disgusted with my condition, I found a determined melancholy creeping rapidly upon me and threatening to plunge me into all the horrors of insanity. To rouse myself and to prevent its overwhelming me, I sought for pleasure abroad, and again plunged into dissipation of every kind. But pleasures soon weary, where the mind has no relief in occupations of a serious nature. In a short time the bottle afforded me the only means of getting rid of thoughts which tormented me. In the delirium of intoxication I was happy, and even the aching head which constantly succeeded upon indulgence was preferable to a continued round of healthy inanity. So long as my constitution bid defiance to the consequences of intemperance, so long I felt satisfied with my pursuit. But the day of retribution at last arrived, and the future part of my existence was to pay the forfeit of the folly which I am now relating.

The irregularity of my hours rendered separate beds desirable to both parties. This change, however, did not occasion the slightest murmur, nor could I perceive that it had the least effect in altering the tenor of Lady Erpingham's conduct towards me. As time advanced my mind became more and more estranged, until at last the house which contained my wife was absolutely hateful to me. When in the country I fixed my residence at Bingwood, to which place she had expressed a decided aversion, and when in London I took up my abode at the — hotel.

This was to all intents and purposes a virtual separation. But there was still no interruption in the interchange of civilities. The valet and the lady's maid regularly exchanged bills of health, with the compliments of their respective principals. We occasionally, and but occasionally, met in parties, and I verily believe that to a person who had witnessed our mutual behaviour, during the honey moon and at the time of which I am now speaking, there was no perceptible difference.

What a treasure Lady Erpingham must have been thought in the eyes of that husband to whom fate had awarded a shrew, or to him who had been the victim of a wife's infidelity. As to myself, I honestly declare that I would willingly have exchanged her for the veriest shrew in existence. I should even have been pleased if I could have seen her capable of feeling an interest in any one else.

Having expatiated so much on the deficiencies of Lady Erpingham, it would be doing her an injustice if I neglected to mention that the world did not contain a more scrupulous observer of the established laws of politeness than her Ladyship. Notwithstanding I unfortunately happened to be her husband, I stood in the porter's list among the number of particular friends to whom invitations were regularly sent to every party at Erpingham house. To have omitted the acknowledgement of this proof of her Ladyship's esteem and regard, would have been ungrateful, especially as there were no fewer than fourteen dukes, and only one earl besides myself. There were indeed a few viscounts and barons, but they were only such as had refused an advancement in the peerage upon the plea that the oldest viscount or baron was a personage of infinitely greater importance than the youngest earl or marquis. Many will perhaps be of a different opinion, attaching no small importance to the ennobling by courtesy the youngest sons in some cases, and the daughters in all. But Lady Erpingham was of the ancient house of Vavasour, and estimated the value of nobility as a gourmand does his mutton — by its age.

END OF VOL II.

